[Question] Can I ask you about the problem: Who speaks for Europe? You mentioned the fact that you have this rotating chairmanship of the Community, that every 6 months it's somebody else. Now if you do manage to have a European, a distinctly European voice in the world, who is going to be the spokesman? At the moment you operate roughly on the principle of Buggin's turn.

[Answer] Yes, that's right. I think that's bound to continue. I think it is very important if we are going to make Europe, the political cooperation in Europe, a reality, that there shouldn't be a sort of dominance of Europe by the bigger countries in Europe to the exclusion of the importance of the smaller ones. Therefore it is quite important that every 6 months there should be, so to speak, a change of chairman and that he has the opportunity of operating. It operated very successfully these last 6 months with the smallest of all European countries. Gaston Thorn, who was until recently foreign minister of Luxembourg, did on behalf of the Community all the contacts with the Arab countries and with Israel and was the spokesman of Europe. It was very successful.

[Question] He got a terrible reception from Mr Begin of Israel, didn't he? Now do you think that you would have got the same?

[Answer] I'm sure I would, yes. I think that anybody--because, you see, the Israelis didn't really approve very much of the Venice declaration. But they received Mr Thorn very courteously and they had apparently a good conversation. I hope good will come out of it. At least they understanding our position much better than they did before, and we understand theirs, I hope.

[Question] We now have a new president of the United States, who is about to be installed and there are calls of acclaim from allies and adversaries alike that he is a man of quite exceptional statesmanship, maturity and everything else. Is that opinion possibly a shade premature? Or is it a feeling that one has to begin influencing him now?

[Answer] Well, I expect people are rather inclined to go from on extreme to the other. I seem to remember a short while ago that everybody was writing off Governor Reagan. Now they are taking the opposite view. I think that from all accounts and everything that we have read about Mr Reagan, he will not only--he was a very good governor of California--be a good president he will surround himself, I hope, with very experienced people. [end recording]

[Wheeler] Finding ways of aligning their foreign policies won't be the main preoccupation of the Community's ministers. The year of 1981 is to be a year of internal reform, a year in which the EEC faces the problems created by its enlargement in 1973 from six to nine and rewrites the rules of the budget and the CAP [Common Agricultural Policy]. Now that's going to be a daunting job and all the more so because 1981 will also see the start of the second bout of enlargement from 9 to 12, with Greece joining the Community on New Year's Day and Spain to be followed by Portugal, next in the queue. I put it to Lord Carrington that absorbing these three new members before the Community has digested Britain, Denmark and Ireland, may prove an intolerable strain.

[Begin recording] [Question] Here we are, in the middle of a recession, enlarging the Community even further, taking in Greece and already beginning to take in Spain and Portugal. Does that make sense?

[Answer] Well, it makes very good political sense, and I think that we've always got to take account of the politics of Europe. I mean here you've got three countries, all three of which were under dictators, which have returned to parliamentary democracy, and I believe that if those countries want to join the Community and feel that if will reinforce their new-found parliamentary democracy by joining the Community, we should seek as far as we possibly can to accommodate them.

What I think we must--I mean Greece is settled, Greece joins on 1 January--but on the question of Spain and Portugal we must--we are very much in favor of them joining--what we've got to do is, at the same time as negotiating their entry into the Community, to negotiate the restructuring of the budget so that we all know exactly where we're going in terms of how much we spend on what and who contributes and who gains. And this, I think, can be done in parallel.

[Question] But there is a conflict there, isn't there? Would you agree that enlargement is going to slow down those reforms we want to make it acceptable to Britain, for example?

[Answer] No, I don't think it will slow it down, no, I don't think that. I think that we've got some difficult negotiations in the community as a whole about the restructuring of the Community budget. But one of the good things that's happened is that since 30 May there are other people, other than ourselves, other countries who are equally anxious to see the restructuring of the budget. I mean Germany now is the biggest contributor, net contributor to the budget. The French are now contributing quite a large sum of money to the budget. So really there is a compulsion on everyone to see whether or not they can get the whole structure of the thing changed.

[Question] Finally, Lord Carrington, looking down the road, can you say roughly how many years it is likely to take before the Community begins to function as you'd like to and where people in places like Northern Ireland, the northeast, the depressed areas of Britain can actually see it being of direct benefit to their lives?

[Answer] Oh, I think it's of direct benefit to their lives now. But I think that we ought to start from the beginning of next year to do some of the things that I've been talking about earlier on. And some of them don't even cost money. And I think we've got to try to make it more apparent to people of all Europe that it is of advantage to them. I'm sure we've got to increase political cooperation because that's very important. We shall be--Britain will be--president of the Council from July next year for 6 months. It will certainly be my intention to push ahead with some of the things that I've been talking about.

[Question] Will that be an activist period this time when Britain's in the chair?

[Answer] It will be very activist because it will be the moment when we shall all be talking for the first time about the restructuring of the budget. It's not going to be an easy time. [end recording]

INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS RESUME IN NICOSIA

TA031811 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 3 Dec 80

[Text] The intercommunal talks resumed at the Ledra Palace in Nicosia this afternoon. The interlocutors discussed today the constitutional aspect of the Cyprus problem which is the third point of the agenda. Speaking to correspondents before the meetings, the UN special representative in Cyprus, Mr Hugo Gobbi, said that the talks were continuing in a sustained manner in a friendly atmosphere, the best in the history of the talks and that there was a mature dialogue. He said his impression was that this was a tremendous achievement. Replying to another question Mr Gobbi said that if the sustained dialogue and exchange of ideas were maintained in the present way, a moment would come in which a condition of obtaining fruitful results would be achieved.

The Turkish Cypriot and Greek Cypriot interlocutors both said that the talks were continuing in a friendly atmosphere.

Comments on Talks

[Text] A UN statement on today's meeting of the intercommunal talks said that both sides amicably and constructively continued their in-depth deliberations on various questions and ideas concerning the constitutional aspect of the Cypriot issue in accordance with the procedures that had been agreed upon. The next meeting will be held on Monday and will deal with the territorial aspect of the issue.

Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, as well as the two interlocutors, Ioannidhis and Onan, made statements before the opening of today's meeting. Gobbi said: We are in a very difficult bargaining process. He added, however, that everything was developing in the foreseeable manner and expressed the conviction that the time would come when there would be fruitful results.

Ioannidhis said that there were proposals by both sides at the negotiating table. He also expressed the hope that progress would be made in clarifying the positions of both sides.

The Turkish Cypriot interlocutor said in his statement that the settlement of the Cypriot issue would be a compromise, adding that there would be give and take on both sides on the constitutional aspect and possibly on the territorial issue as well. He also said that the same applied to the question of practical measures.

CYPRUS ISSUE POSTPONED ON UN DEBATE AGENDA

[Text] An official statement denies today's press reports alleging that the Cypriot issue has been removed from the agenda of UN organs and committees, and stresses that the issue is on the UN General Assembly agenda and there is no question of removing it.

The statement points out that during the general debate at the UN General Assembly, many foreign ministers and other delegates referred to the Cypriot issue. The statement adds: The General Assembly will take up the issue soon and it is obvious that, because the inter-Cypriot talks are continuing, it would not be expedient to pursue a debate of the Cypriot issue at this year's session. Under the circumstances, it will be asked that the issue be referred to the next General Assembly session. A similar procedure was followed in the case of the Mideast issue in 1973.

GOVERNMENT SPOKESMAN REPLIES TO DENKTAS, TURKMEN

[Text] Yesterday, the government spokesman commented on the latest statements made by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas and Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen.

Referring to Denktas' statement that the discussions underway at the intercommunal talks on the territorial aspect are being held for the readjustment of the borders, the spokesman said: "We consider it our duty to stress that the talks are not being held for the readjustment of the borders, as characterized by Denktas. The territorial issue is not one of setting the borders, but one of substance, and its settlement will help the promotion of a substantive solution of the whole problem."

With regard to the Turkish foreign minister's statement, the spokesman said that Turkmen has tried to connect the Famagusta issue with the total solution of the problem. The spokesman continued: "It is known that Denktas had agreed to the 10 points of the 19 May agreement, which the Turkish Government also supported, and on the basis of which the talks are being held. This agreement includes point five, which gives priority to the Famagusta issue and provides that once an agreement has been reached on this issue it will be implemented regardless of the status of other issues. Consequently, he concluded, any deviation from this agreement constitutes a Turkish withdrawal.

In reply to editors' questions, the spokesman said that the government does not refuse to discuss a proposal for an interim agreement on the Famagusta issue, but this does not mean that it accepts such a possibility or that it precludes it.

DENKTAS REQUESTS GOBBI HELP ON STUDENTS ISSUE

[Text] President Denktas had a meeting today with the UN special representative in Cyprus, Mr Gobbi, on the problems of the Greek Cypriot students in the south whose families are living in the Karpas area. At the meeting, held at his request, President Denktas said he had asked Mr Gobbi to call on the Greek Cypriot administration not to raise political objections to the crossing over to the north of the Greek Cypriot students for the Christmas holidays.

It will be recalled that for the past 2 years, the Greek Cyrpiot administration has been raising objections to the completion of entry and departure forms by these students while visiting the north. It is worthy of note that such forms are being completed every year by hundreds of Maronite students who are also attending schools in the south, and that the Maronite students were spending their holidays with their families in the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

I KATHIMERINI DISCUSSES IMPASSE IN CYPRUS TALKS

[Editorial: "Expediency and Prospects"]

[Text] According to Nicosia reports, although the new round of the so-called intercommunal negotiations which started last September has come up against difficulties, it has not yet reached an impasse similar to that which resulted in the severance of last year's "round" in June 1979, only days after it was started. According to relevant reports, the difficulties consist of the fact that the Turkish side-despite its undertaken obligation--so far tries to avoid submission of specific proposals on questions on the negotiations agenda and specifically on the questions of Famagusta and the territorial aspect of the Cyprus problem.

Naturally, nobody wonders over these difficulties and the crablike progress of the "intercommunal" negotiations. For 6 years now there have been repeated rounds of such negotiations without any result. Until the present round there was no discussion even because for 5 whole years the Turkish side even refused dialogue and came to the various rounds of these "intercommunal" negotiations simply in order to appear in conformity to the provisions of UN resolutions, in order to "deceive" world public opinion and in order to supply the various well-known well-wishers and "supporters" of Turkey with the "argument" that "something is being done." The Kiprianou-Denktas agreement of 19 May 1979 did give rise to certain hopes that at least some way would be sought, no matter how difficult and long, toward a logical and generally acceptable solution to the Cyprus issue. All these hopes were dashed, however, only a few weeks later when during the "intercommunal" negotiations which had started on the basis of this Kiprianou-Denktas agreement the Turkish side broke faith with and reneged on that agreement with the result that negotiations were severed even before they fundamentally got underway.

If, therefore, the repeated rounds of intercommunal negotiations proved something, it is that the goal of Turkey is to legalize and strengthen the "faits accomplis," in other words the population and territorial partition of Cyprus, on the basis of the "Attila line."

Has anything changed this goal? It most certainly has not. Consequently we have the question: What then is the purpose of the new round of intercommunal negotiation and their crablike progress since last September? The answer is that these negotiations are a provision under the resolutions of the United Nations and a request by the UN General Assembly. Compliance to such a provision, therefore, is a self-contained political action and of itself meets a particular expediency irrespective of any outcome (or lack of outcome) of the negotiations and their basic content, even irrespective of any evaluations or prospects about their outcome.

The difference between difficulties and impasse, this time, lies in the political determination to continue negotiations as a process, even without any prospect of fundamental progress, both for the reasons we mentioned above and for the purpose of providing a contact through which it may be possible to reach an agreement on certain local practical settlements which, without naturally promoting a solution to the Cyprus problem, could bring some comfort the two populations. Among such settlements could be included the payment of pensions to those entitled to one on both sides of the demarcation line, restoration of the cohesion of the electric power supply network throughout Cyprus, reopening of the Nicosia airport and others. As a condition it is also likely that the inhabitants of Famagusta could return to their homes and their properties.

These probable practical settlements also set the limits and prospects of the intercommunal dialogue in its present phase. Any fundamental progress in the direction of a generally acceptable solution to the Cyprus issue, which would not simply be an effort to strengthen the "faits accomplis," should not be expected because the objective factors and the balance of power which support today's state of affairs, and the entire complex of Turkish "national" goals--which include a part of its aims in Cyprus--have not yet altered in any way. In expectation of a change in these factors and this balance--which most certainly will take place some day and, perhaps in the not too distant a future--the process of intercommunal negotiations will continue with interruptions and, perhaps, without great expectations, but naturally only if and to the degree that this process does not undermine the legal and vital interests of Cypriot Hellenism.

At the same time, the Greek side must prepare itself for the time when conditions and objective factors will change; in other words, for the time of a change in the "dynamics" of the broader areas of the Near and Middle East. Such a time should not find us unprepared in all sectors...

GOVERNMENT SIGNS $200 MILLION U.S. LOAN AGREEMENT

TA041240 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 4 Dec 80

[Text] An agreement for a $200 million U.S. loan to Turkey was signed in Ankara today. This loan is to be used for Turkey's urgent needs, and $134 million is a grant-in-aid. The amount of $66 million will be repaid in 20 years with a 5-percent interest rate after a 5-year moratorium.

This loan has been granted to Turkey within the framework of the OECD meeting held in Paris in which the United States undertook to extend Turkey a $295 million loan. The first part of this loan consisting of $95 million has already been granted in accordance with an agreement signed in Ankara in October.

The agreement was signed by Turkish Finance Minister Kaya Erdem and by U.S. Charge d'Affaires in Ankara Richard Burns. In a statement during the signing ceremony, the finance minister said that the agreement was a significant example of the cooperation existing between the two countries. Erdem added that the loan would be used in closing Turkey's foreign trade gap. In his statement, the U.S. charge d'affaires said he believed the loan would contribute to Turkey's economic development efforts.

The next session of the committee, whose delegations were led by Turkish diplomat Asaf Inhan and Ambassador Kuznetsov of the Soviet Union will be held in Moscow after completion of land surveys.

REPRESENTATIVE RAISES VISA ISSUE AT EEC MEETING

[Text] The third meeting this year of the Turkish-EEC Association Committee was held today in Brussels at the level of permanent representatives. Turkey's permanent representative at the EEC, Amb Cenap Keskin, was the first speaker at the meeting.

According to information received by a Turkish Radio and Television correspondent, Keskin reported on political developments and economic stability measures in Turkey. He then referred to the visa requirement imposed on Turkish citizens by certain members of the EEC. Pointing out that the visa requirement is not compatible with the agreements between Turkey and the EEC and that it has disadvantages from a humanitarian viewpoint, Keskin said that the requirement has damaging effects on the Turkish economy. Further noting that the visa requirement could injure the relations between Turkey and the Community, Keskin said that the solution to the problem should be sought within the framework of the association committee.

Luxembourg's permanent representative at the EEC, (Ron Dillinger), who is the current president of the EEC, said in a speech that the Community aims to continue its cooperation with Turkey. He noted that the visa requirement is a matter between Turkey and the concerned countries and despite this the committee fully sympathizes with the humanitarian aspect of the problem. He also said that the discussion of the visa question at the association committee will enable the views of the Turkish Government to be given to the representatives of member countries.

VOTCP QUESTIONS MISSION OF IMF DELEGATION

TA040845 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 4 Dec 80

[Station commentary: "Imperialists Continue To Supervise the National Economy"]

[Excerpts] Dear listeners, an IMF delegation is paying a new visit to Turkey and its mission is to supervise the national economy. It will also exert efforts to shape the national economy in a way that will benefit only imperialists and monopolies, and to examine the results thus far of the so-called economic stability program--also imposed by the imperialists and monopolies.

A few examples are enough to disclose the results achieved by the economic stability program imposed by the IMF, other finance organizations and their domestic collaborators, the monopolies. First, the growth rate of the national economy which dropped to zero is not falling below this rate. Along with this development, unemployment rates are reaching record proportions, increasing from 21 percent at the beginning of 1980 to a current 22 percent. The foreign trade deficit is deteriorating and Turkey's foreign debts reached $20 billion--or $30 billion including interest rates. Another striking result of this program has been revealed in a state organization report marked for internal use only. The report says that inflation has currently reached 80 percent, and is expected to reach 150 percent by 1981.

All these facts prove one point, namely, that attempts to direct the national economy in a way that will serve the benefits of imperialists and their domestic collaborators, the monopolies, lead nowhere. There is only one way out of this impasse: to oppose the pressures and sovereignty of the imperialists and the monopolies, which are their domestic collaborators, and to intensify multilateral relations with neighboring socialist countries led by the Soviet Union.

HURRIYET EDITORIAL EXAMINES 1981 DRAFT BUDGET

[Oktay Eksi editorial: "What About Former Statements?"]

[Text] Honorable Finance Minister Kaya Erdem, in presenting the draft budget law for the 1981 fiscal year, is reported to have said: "The 1981 budget will be an anti-inflation budget. It is based on powerful resources and does not favor open financing."

Since these words did not sound strange to our ears, we went through our files and discovered that at a press conference held on 1 December 1979, former [Justice Party] Finance Minister Ismet Sezgin had introduced the 1980 budget with these words: "This budget will be an anti-inflation budget." A year before that, RPP Finance Minister Ziya Muezzinolgu said precisely the same thing.

Naturally we could not expect them to say "we are going to encourage inflation." But we could expect them to be a little more sincere and a little less pretentious, for that would save us from hoping in vain that we would be redeemed from inflation.

It could be argued that "Kaya Erdem is not a minister operating within a parliamentary system, like Sezgin or Muezzinoglu. For this reason Erdem stands a better chance of fulfilling his promise since he does not have to appear sympathetic to either public opinion or to a specific section of the electorate."

That is true, but Honorable Erdem will implement his "anti-inflationist policy" not in heaven but in Turkey, and under Turkey's present realities. Unfortunately, these realities do not encourage us to share Honorable Erdem's optimism.

Let us cite the reasons: Honorable Erdem has based his present promises on the economic and financial policies announced on 24 January 1980, which are still in force. What is more, he must have spoken on the assumption that this policy will continue, but the early indications are that the economic and financial measures in question have not been as successful as the public had expected them to be. For example, the 24 January decisions, which have devalued the Turkish lira excessively, have not increased our exports at all. Nor have the subsequent devaluations shown the slightest effect on them. On the other hand, every devaluation has increased the value of imports to an unbearable degree. The measures known as "easing formalities," which were expected to facilitate the entry of foreign capital into Turkey and to enhance exports, have yielded practically no result. The revenues secured from the price increases imposed on the products of the public enterprises have evaporated because the "rational and profitable management measures" that ought to have followed the price increases have not been taken.

This policy has only been successful in that it has secured the approval of the IMF and other foreign establishments like the World Bank, as well as OECD and EEC circles, which actually means that the loans will only help the Turkish economy to survive a little longer under the oxygen tent. This is in sharp contrast with the results which were intended to "save our economy."

Consequently, it would be more appropriate for those who run our economy and finance to display realism rather than unnecessary optimism. This would be more compatible with the honesty we expect of them.

[Unattributed report: "Force Reduction: Again Dispute Over 'Geographic Factor'"]

[Text] At the force reduction conference in Vienna on Thursday the East again rejected Western demands that NATO's geographic disadvantages in central Europe should be given due consideration in an agreement on reducing armed forces in this region.

Hungarian Chief Delegate Zoltan Fodor stressed at the 254th plenary session of the conference that the so-called geographic factor had already been discussed in the preliminary talks and was now deliberately being raised again by the West in order to delay the negotiations. A Western press spokesman said in this context that one "could not talk away" the fact that the Soviet Union directly borders on the central European reduction area, whereas the United States is 5,000 kilometers away from it, which makes for completely unequal strategic preconditions, he said.

LABOR PARTY BOARD VOTES ON U.S. WEAPONS STORAGE

LD01203C Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1800 GMT 1 Dec 80

[Text] In Norway the party board of the Labor Party has approved the framework agreement negotiated between the United States and Norway on the storage of U.S. weapons in Norway. The agreement was approved by a 30 to 6 vote. The agreement will be discussed by the Storting on 5 December. Ulla-Maria Johansen reports from Oslo:

[Begin recording] The equipping of Norway with American military equipment is a process which can no longer be stopped. The party board of the Labor Party approved the equipment storage agreement, negotiated between the United States and Norway, with 30 against 6 votes. The agreement will be passed with a large majority by the Social Democrats and the non-Socialist parties. The only way of stopping the agreement is a national referendum. This will not, however, be resorted to as was earlier done in deciding on Norway's membership in the EEC.

The equipping of Norway with U.S. weapons and the keeping of the gate open for nuclear weapons in a possible crisis situation does not, however, enjoy the nation's confidence. Lately there have been frequent opinion polls, and they show that the majority of Norwegians, who have an opinion on the country's armaments, do not want U.S. weapons in the country. With regard to Norway's nuclear weapons policy, over 60 percent of the Norwegians oppose this policy--which does not forbid the use of nuclear weapons on Norwegian territory in a possible crisis or war situation. Over 60 percent are opposed to the NATO military maneuvers carried out in Norweigan airspace with the participation of U.S. fighters carrying nuclear weapons. [end recording]

FRG SUPPORTS EEC STATEMENT ON SOVIET INTERVENTION

[Excerpts] Bonn, 5 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Government has not made known its concern over developments in Poland and the possibility of Soviet intervention directly to the Soviet leadership because it considers its attitude to be made sufficiently clear in the Luxembourg statement of the EEC heads of state and government. Government Spokesman Boelling said at a press conference in Bonn today that the communique of the EEC summit which contains an indirect warning against Soviet intervention in Poland requires no further elucidation and can be safely assumed to have been noted by those concerned. The document has served its purpose at the moment of its publication.

In response to repeated questions Boelling said he does not know whether the EEC statement has been or would be conveyed formally through diplomatic channels to the USSR. He gave a renewed assurance that the Federal Republic would continue to observe its policy of strict restraint toward developments in Poland.

Press Review on Polish Events

[Press review on tensions in Poland]

[Excerpt] BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG writes: The appeal of the Polish Communists' Central Committee has dramatic features. There are no threats, but rather pleading promises, almost begging to safeguard that which has been achieved. The party's position is restricted, its back is to the wall. The times of earlier omnipotence are gone. The party is prepared to share power with the new trade union of Lech Walesa and the old church of Cardinal Wyczynsiki and Pope Woityla--forces that have turned out to be stronger than the party itself.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE notes: Maybe Kania has really resigned himself to dealing for years with an independent trade union--which is what he says at least. But can one imagine the same with regard to Brezhnev, Suslov and Marshal Ustinov? So it is not easy for the Poles to realize what the Central Committee is really demanding from them. They have to expect that the leadership will say less than it thinks or knows in these dramatic hours. Has a decision already been made in Moscow? It could be that the Soviet Politburo has decided on a conditional act of force: We will invade if law and order has not been established in Poland by a certain date.

NEUE RUHR-ZEITUNG of Essen comes to the following conclusion: The Warsaw document, published 24 hours after the Central Committee session, will open a new chapter 5 months after the first strike days in Gdansk, a new chapter not only for Poland but for European history. We can hold our breath, but there is probably nobody who can stop the course of history. The warnings of the Europeans and the Americans directed at Moscow are serious. This time they are not verbal commitments. The seriousness of the situation is reflected by every word the European Community and Washington have said about Poland in recent hours.

OW050958 Hong Kong AFP in English 0946 GMT 5 Dec 80

[Text] Wellington, Dec. 5 (AFP)--The French have exploded two underground nuclear tests at their Mururoa test site in the South Pacific over the past week. Government scientists in New Zealand confirmed the two underground blasts, which signal a new test series at the atoll testing centre. A medium-sized nuclear blast was fired at the atoll yesterday, according to the government's monitoring station in the Cook Islands north of New Zealand. The second, and smaller blast, was recorded earlier in the week. The new blasts are the first neclear testing by the French for several months, although New Zealand's Greenpeace Organisation claimed a new series of tests was due to begin at the end of October.

FRANCOIS-PONCET ON TALKS WITH FRG ON POLAND

[Jean Wetz dispatch: "Francois-Poncet Says in Bonn: Foreign Intervention Would Create 'Extremely Grave Crisis'"]

[Text] Bonn--If the Poles were deprived of their present right to "determine their own future," East-West relations would experience "an extremely grave crisis," French Foreign Minister Francois-Poncet said following his 27 November talks with his FRG counterpart Mr Genscher. He explained that on this point the Paris and Bonn leaders have "identical feelings." This observation is nothing new, but hitherto the FRG's warnings to the Soviet Union have not been formulated in such categorical terms. On the banks of the Rhine, it seems, they prefer to emphasize the need to maintain the utmost reserve with regard to events in Poland.

Mr Francois-Poncet's visit to Bonn took place within the framework of what are now routine consultations between the two countries. His primary aim was to make preparations for the European Council meeting in Luxembourg. In this connection the French minister was able to note with satisfaction that the conversations revealed "a similar viewpoint on all the major issues of the present international situation." He added that the determination of the EC and particularly of the French and German leaders remains as steadfast as ever with regard to asserting Europe's own role. In this connection the minister echoed Giscard d'Estaing's view that the decline of the Old World since the end of World War II is "abnormal."

But is the understandable anxiety not to shock the new Washington administration enough to explain Chancellor Schmidt's unwillingness to invoke this European autonomy in his government statement Monday?

With regard to East-West relations, Mr Francois-Poncet explained why he considers the term "detente" inappropriate at a time when "everyone spends his time complaining about tensions." As for Chancellor Schmidt, though he has not entirely banished the word from his vocabulary, in his statement Money he did talk much more about the essential "balance" between the West and the Soviet bloc.

With regard to the repercussions of the U.S. elections on relations with the Kremlin, Mr Francois-Poncet said that nothing hasty must be done before the new administration is installed in Washington. There is no need, however, for such a pause with regard to the Near East. The European initiative begun last summer at the Venice conference was, he said, very well received by the countries of the region concerned. Now the experts have drawn up a document some 30 pages long defining the principles which the EC intends to adopt with a view to promoting a solution. This document will be submitted to the Luxembourg Council. Without in any way dismissing the importance of the role played by the United States, the European initiative would therefore follow its "normal course" and there is no reason to either delay or accelerate its progress.

PREMIER VIEWS EC ISSUES, DIALOGUE WITH USSR

LD041243 Brussels LE SOIR in French 25 Nov 80 p 7

[Yvon Toussaint, Jacques Cordy and Yves Benoit interview with Premier Raymond Barre in Paris: "The EEC Is Making an Independent Voice Heard"--date not given]

[Text] [Question] Aside from the "crises" which are the lot of the EC but which seem recently to have called into question its fundamental mechanisms (financing, Common Agricultural Policy), isn't the very organization of the Nine's Council, in which the French-German twosome dominates and in which the "small" countries can no longer play the role of "honest courtiers" which they once did, contributing to the stalemate reached on Community problems?

[Answer] I do not agree with your analysis. The Community has not reached a stalemate. The Common Market for industrial products and the agricultural policy, which are the two pillars on which the Community rests, are continuing to function despite an increasingly worrying economic and international climate. The building of a unified economic zone has been consolidated in a way which could become definitive following the creation of the European Monetary System in 1979. Finally, the Community makes an essential contribution to solving some fundamental problems in our economy, as we have just seen with the introduction of a crisis plan for steel.

This is mainly because our countries are deeply convinced that maintaining the process of building Europe is vital for them, because they now know that the Community can, in many cases, solve the serious problems they are facing and defend their interests vis-a-vis third countries better than they could individually. It is also--and this is essential--because there is a specific, close and confident understanding between France and the FRG which is growing each day.

This understanding is the very origin of the Community and the pact which has united the six Common Market founding members for the past 20 years. Today, as in the past, it constitutes a dynamic factor in the building of Europe. Is there any need to recall that it formed the basis of the European Monetary System--a decisive element in the stability of our economies and at the same time the precondition for the survival of the Common Market and the Common Agricultural Policy? European building would lose its impetus if the understanding between France and the FRG were undermined.

The Community is facing serious problems at present. This situation is in no way surprising.

Indeed, like all industrialized countries, our countries are experiencing difficulties which have no precedent since the war, created by an economic climate in which increased energy prices, inflation, unemployment and low growth are combined; it would be miraculous if they did not hinder the Community's progress in one way or another.

At the same time, the Community has to solve the problems it has been facing since 1973 when it was expanded to include Denmark, Ireland and Britain, and it will shortly have to overcome the problems which will be caused by the entry of Greece, followed by Portugal and Spain. Is this surprising? We must recognize that the expansion is making the Community into something different from the Community which existed in the first phase of the building of Europe, and we must not exhaust ourselves in trying to reconcile the irreconcilable.

Let us hope that the Community members who have decided to preserve the Community's achievements and want to progress toward extending their relations will continue to move forward and will remain the "hard core" of the West European organization.

[Question] On the other hand, political cooperation seems to be increasing and, in the absence of joint action, seems to be making joint stances possible. Despite these efforts, isn't the remark which former Belgian Foreign Minister Henri Simonet often made, "if the EEC had a foreign policy people would know about it," still pertinent?

[Answer] I think you are being rather unfair about European political cooperation. I would like to point out first that political cooperation means consultation among member-states, which cannot be confused with the Community mechanisms, and that it obeys the rule of consensus. Second, I would like to stress that the objectives of political cooperation have been fixed in carefully considered but precise terms: information, consultations, harmonization of viewpoints and finally, when it seems useful and desirable, joint action. This cooperation has enabled us to obtain important results, and the world is aware of this even though it is not regarded favorably in every quarter.

In 1980 alone the Nine adopted a joint position on the Near East with the Venice statement. With regard to events in Afghanistan the strong and restrained attitude taken by the European countries has met with a broad echo in the world, notably among the Islamic countries most directly involved. In the affair of the U.S. hostages in Tehran the Community countries adopted a joint stance which was fully supported by the Japanese foreign minister, who came from Tokyo for this express purpose. At the United Nations the Nine's representatives are in constant consultation with each other and, in most cases, vote the same way. In all spheres of international life the Community is expressing its views and asserting itself. It is speaking with an independent voice a little more every day; it is exerting its own influence on the international scene.

France has never spared and will never spare its efforts to ensure that Europe acts as Europe and for itself. This will end the anomaly of its relative effacement in major world affairs since the end of World War II, which will benefit everyone.

[Question] Haven't the recent European Council meetings illustrated the Nine's inability to unite and face the challenges of our time, be they economic or energy crises?

[Answer] The European Council's recent history seems to me to illustrate the important role it has played in the economic and energy policy spheres. It was in the European Council that the methods for establishing the European Monetary System--a system which makes the Community, in the present disorder, a zone of monetary stability--were proposed and defined. In addition to this there are the European Council's efforts to overcome the economic difficulties besetting our countries.

Although it is true that a considerable amount still has to be done as far as energy is concerned, it should be pointed out that it was at the European Council session in Strasbourg in June 1979 that we decided on provisions regarding energy savings and the development of resources other than oil which form the basis for Community action and were upheld in the Western framework.

These actions help to give the Community an active role in developing international economic relations. Interdependence is the fundamental fact in this development. In seeking to adapt the world economy to the new energy situation and in striving to encourage convergence between the member-states' economic policies, the Community is making a major contribution to building new relations among nations, which adds to its major participation in trade and its action to help the developing countries.

[Question] As far as Atlantic defense is concerned France, while remaining outside the integrated military organization, now seems to be a better ally than some NATO members such as Belgium which at present are reluctant to assume their share of responsibility.

At the same time, however, is French diplomacy, by encouraging consultations at the "superpower" level, sometimes to the detriment of consultation within the alliance, not contributing to the mental demobilization of many small members of the alliance?

[Answer] France is attached to its independence. That is why is has made and is continuing to make a major defense effort. In 1981 this effort will be reflected by a defense budget which will be up by 17.9 percent compared with the 1980 budget--representing a very large increase in real terms. This figure gives a better indication than long speeches of my country's determination to ensure its security and bear its responsibilities within the alliance to which it belongs, and of its conviction that each country's effort or lack of effort affects the security of all. Furthermore, I do not see how the consultations which France is having with some of its main partners could damage cooperation within the alliance or contribute to the mental demobilization of any of its allies.

[Question] Do the Afghan affair, the developments in Poland, which remind us of the limitations in the East on the principle of noninterference--the foundation of the Helsinki accords--and the GDR's tougher line in Berlin not call for a reassessment of "detente?" Is the "detente or war" alternative not leading the West to close its eyes and convince itself that the first must be preserved and the specter of the latter removed?

[Answer] France has always had a demanding view of detente; it has never used this word to conceal the neutralist temptation, complacency toward anybody or any illusory pacifism. France ensures its security by its defense effort, is loyal to its alliances and intends to continue a dialogue with the Soviet Union and the East European countries which it regards as necessary to stability and peace in Europe and the world. It has helped to push back "bloc politics" and does not wish to return to those politics.

My country is convinced that detente should be based on respect for each country's independence and for its right to determine its own path. For France detente is all-embracing and indivisible. That is why France was of the opinion that the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was unacceptable and dealt a very serious blow to detente. It hopes that Poland will overcome its present difficulties itself, without foreign interference but with the support of all its friends. France considers that dialogue is a vital means of preserving peace. Moreover, it notes that those who wish to call detente into question often do so on behalf of others while for their own part continuing to maintain dialogue with the Soviet Union, which they deem profitable to their country.

LE MONDE ON REAGAN'S LIKELY IMPACT ON MIDEAST

LD041205 Paris LE MONDE in French 29 Nov 80 pp 1, 4

[Philippe de Saint-Rovert article: "Near East Powder Keg"]

[Text] While European leaders are diplomatically pretending to welcome Ronald Reagan's election to the U.S. presidency, the Near East is perhaps, as a Lebanese diplomat confided to me a few days ago in Beirut, on the eve of another conflagration. In fact the danger is still spreading, without diminishing, because the Arabian-Persian Gulf, whose possible "destabilization" has often been invoked to distract attention from the Palestinian issue, has in fact entered a critical period in its modern history. There are two reasons for this, between which various links can be imagined: the Iraqi-Iranian conflict and Mr Reagan's imminent assumption of power.

The various Gulf Emirates, whether federated or not, which lack their own military strength and large populations but are vast producers of oil, are in a particularly delicate, not to say threatening, geopolitical situation, but the European countries (whose last resort they are) do not seem fully aware of it.

Ever since the outbreak of the Baghdad-Tehran conflict, everything possible seems to have been done to further increase the two superpowers' status as arbiters of the region. As things stand, it would take next to nothing for the conflict to spread to the Gulf, and Kuwait is not the only country to be afraid. The United Arab Emirates federation is directly concerned and its leaders do not conceal their anxiety. Indeed, the three famous islets seized by imperial Iran in 1971 with the blessing of the United States and Britain in principle detract from the Emirates' sovereignty. One can therefore imagine the friendly pressure being exerted by Iraq to "liberate" them and the embarrassment of the federated princes, threatened moreover by reprisals from Iran, which, though it has become revolutionary, is nonetheless attached to the shah's gains. Abu Dhabi therefore intends to assert its rights solely through negotiation.

This policy on the part of the Emirates clearly reflects a constant and deep-seated current in the region--a conservative-type Arab nationalism. Objectively, it serves the interests of the West, although it stands apart from the Israeli leaders' political paranoia. This is why Europe is cajoled--out of fear of the excesses of U.S. policy. Now there will be a big temptation for Washington to transform Saudi Arabia, following the Egyptian model, into an openly acknowledged and permanent military base. In the light of the Pahlavis' tragedy, all observers of the region are aware of the dangers stemming from such rashness: The excessive identification of a power with U.S. tutelage, closely linked with Zionism, brings grist to the mill of revolutionary movements and sooner or later prompts a subversion. It does not seem that the new U.S. team is likely to learn its lesson from such apparently disastrous past ventures--indeed, quite the contrary. If only Europe wielded influence in Washington, nights in the Gulf would be less haunted by apprehensions!

From one powder keg to the other, and though war and death are everyday companions in Lebanon, the situation in Beirut also reflects the general tension. The more apparently senseless the events that occur (in the west a car accident which degenerates into a pitched battle between rival factions, in the east boobytrapped cars exploding in the middle of the day) the more dangerous they are, inasmuch as they indicate the extent to which the Lebanese tragedy is still manipulated from outside. Only former President Shamtun and the Al-Jumayyil tribe (itself very much divided) believe or pretend to believe that there is a Lebanese problem that can be resolved by the Lebanese, though Americans and Europeans are lending a hand. The causes which render such a solution utopian are the very ones which created the tragic situation and which nobody pretends do not exist.

The Phalangist faction nurtures another unrealistic viewpoint, which very clearly reflects the irrationality of its position. This viewpoint prompts the Lebanese rightwing leaders to revile with bitter reproaches the European countries, which in their opinion are insufficiently independent of the United States. It is very difficult to make them realize that the policy of the European countries, especially France, stands apart quite clearly from U.S. policy, but in a direction directly opposed to the one they want, though in their best interests.

It might seem to some people that the Palestinian revolution, or at least the Palestinians' policy and diplomacy, has reached an impasse. No, Yasir 'Arafat said in an interview which he granted to me and which seems not to have pleased everyone (note: an interview granted jointly to Melhem Karam, editor of LA REVUE DU LIBAN, and published in part by that magazine on 15 November 1980). The Palestinian revolution constitutes more of an impasse for its adversaries than for itself. "I do not now want to discuss," he added, "the U.S. electoral circus in which the three candidates, Reagan, Carter and Anderson, vied with each other in issuing promises to Israel and insults to the PLO. We know that this was an electoral circus, we could have ignored it. Nevertheless, we issued a memorandum because no U.S. leader must attack a UN member or observer member.

"Following his election victory Reagan issued two statements in 48 hours on two fundamental issues. The first was devoted to SALT II and relations with the USSR. In the second he discussed only the Palestinian issue and the PLO.

"It is true that there is nothing positive in what he said about the PLO and the Palestinian people. But the fact that this issue featured in one of his first statements is enough to show how much the PLO has achieved."

The Palestinians say they are prepared to back any agreement which would make it possible to restore the Lebanese state provided it did not result in them being thrown into the sea or pushed back into Jordan, where the situation which led to Black September would quickly recur. Y. 'Arafat says that it is the Israelis and not the Palestinians who are preventing the Lebanese Army from being reestablished in the south, just as it is the Phalangists who are curbing the army's control in Beirut itself (with, moreover, the complicity of some army officers): "The Phalangists are wrong to count on Israel rather than reach agreement with us, because they cannot give the Israelis more than As-Sadat has given them and, despite all that he has given them, despite all the risks he has run, As-Sadat has received nothing in return but rebuffs and humiliations."

Is it still possible for the protagonists in the Lebanese tragedy to talk to each other and find at least temporary solutions? It is certainly possible because there have been and sometimes still are such contacts which still sometimes point to common interests. However, the tragedy is that too many of the factions engaged in the field are now tied (financially and militarily) to outside protectors who stand to gain from a tragedy which is both perpetuating and maintaining the tensions in the region. They therefore turn toward the great powers, they appeal to the United States and turn to Europe while others count on Soviet Russia's ultimate return to the theater of operations.

Ronald Reagan's accession to power and Henry Kissinger's return as tried-and-tested expert in "unimportant tragedies" will, at the lowest estimate, bring about a 2-year regression in the cause of peace in the region. It is possible to have disapproved of the Camp David agreements and at the same time to regret the fact that those responsible for it are no longer there to show how they could have influenced their implementation. Settling the Palestinian problem through Jordan, as will be attempted in the near future, is as ridiculous as having tried to settle it through Egypt, but the absurdity is enhanced by the time which has been wasted. It is true that the State of Israel has never had any other policy but that: playing for time. In this respect the change of administration in Washington serves that policy.

That is why it is very regrettable that the PLO's great diplomatic offensive, which began in Lisbon last year and was subsequently backed by the Austrian chancellor's efforts, has stopped short, because there is no doubt that recognition of the Palestinians' right to self-determination by Europe, and especially by France, constitutes a major and constant element of balance compared with the extreme U.S. stances. Unless this element is further strengthened in the coming years there is also no doubt that the Near East powder keg will explode once again. When I asked Yasir 'Arafat if he had abandoned hope of visiting France at the French Government's invitation, he replied decisively and in a Gaullist way: "I am aware of the pressure which is being blatantly brought to bear in order to prevent that invitation being made. Moreover the affront is directed less against me than against the entire French people. Rothschild said: 'We have prevented 'Arafat from visiting France.' I ask the French people whether they accept being governed by Rothschild."

Such remarks reflect a bitterness and disquiet which is readily understandable, although there is a great deal in them which could be disputed. The trouble is that France in turn has been hindered for many months in its diplomatic action. Furthermore, British diplomacy has just brought Europe as a whole back within the bounds which, essentially, it has never ceased to have. Thus, from the Mediterranean to the Arab-Persian Gulf the rot is setting in and is winning and the conditions for a general conflagration are building up. Those who think that their survival depends on this tragic game will not necessarily be spared by it.

BERLINGUER ON PCI ROLE IN NEW GOVERNMENT

LD041309 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 29 Nov 80 pp 1, 6

[Rocco Di Biasi report on PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer 28 November press conference in Salerno: "We Propose a Democratic Alternative"]

[Excerpts] Salerno--The Communists want a radical change of government, a democratic alternative, but they are not changing their unitary strategy. This was stated clearly in Salerno yesterday afternoon by Comrade Enrico Berlinguer during a very crowded press conference held at the end of a "strictly working" meeting which the PCI devoted to the major topic of the earthquake and the reconstruction of much of southern Italy.

Donato of Radio Newsreel 1 asked whether the oil scandal and the way in which the government has tackled the earthquake have not made the Communists lose their "historical patience." "I believe," Berlinguer replied, "that it is the Italian people who are losing their patience. We do not allow our moves to be dictated by impatience; we believe, instead, that we have reached a situation in which a radical change in the country's leadership is imperative."

So are you shelving the historical compromise, Donato asked? "Ours is not a change of strategy," Berlinguer said. "It is a proposal for a change of government. Clearly our general proposal remains centered on cooperation among the major peoples' forces--the Communist, Socialist and Catholic peoples masses. Ours is not a proposal for a secular government, but for a new government whose driving force is the PCI and which includes representatives of the secular parties among others and also--why not?--the more open and advanced sectors and individuals in that section of the DC which is honest and not implicated in the scandals."

In the event of a new government being formed, CORRIERE DELLA SERA's Giovanni Russo asked, do you believe that it should be headed by a Communist? "We have not yet examined that point," Berlinguer replied, "namely the composition and premiership of the government. Nor, for the time being, have we asked for the immediate opening of a government crisis, because it would be wrong to create a total vacuum at the moment. Though we do believe that because of the scandals and the blameworthy delays and inertia in supplying aid there is a government vacuum and that the blame is not only on the part of local government officials but is also political, on the part of the central state bodies. Who is to blame? The interior minister? Other ministers or under secretaries? The entire government?"

In that case, Russo said, might the new prime minister even be a Socialist? "What is certain," Berlinguer said clearly, "is that come what may, he must not be a Christian Democrat and that the PCI must be the force providing the new government's major guarantee."

MANIFESTO's Valentino Parlato acknowledged that the PCI Directorate's document "is not a merely administrative one." "Is the PCI now less convinced by the national solidarity policy?" he asked. "There are two differences," Berlinguer said: "We state clearly that the DC, having now shown its inability to head the moral reform and regeneration of society and the state, is no longer capable of leading the country's government. The leading role therefore belongs to the PCI as the second largest Italian party, loyal to the constitution and a force, which, from opposition, has proved that it is not implicated in the scandals.

"We are addressing our appeal for the formation of a different kind of government," Berlinguer added, "to all the democratic forces, and primarily the PSI. And we also urge those whoe disagree with this hypothesis to permit this government to be formed."

In short, LA REPUBBLICA's Miriam Mafai asked, are you excluding the whole of the DC? "Careful," the PCI secretary general replied: "It is one thing to say, as we do, that the DC is no longer capable of guaranteeing the country's leadership. It is quite another to rule out relations with a party such as the DC, which is capable of producing advanced stances and honest individuals. Indeed, the Directorate document states" (and Berlinguer quoted it verbatim) "that there is a need for a government which will 'represent and unite the best energies of Italian democracy--capable and honest individuals from the various parties and also from outside them."

But would there not have to be further elections for this to happen? IL MATTINO's Emanuele Imperiali asked, and would it not imply a return to the proposal of a leftwing alternative? "No," Berlinguer said: "we do not believe that elections are essential. Indeed, it would be very dangerous to cause the early dissolution of Parliament and would place the very future of the republic in jeopardy. There have been major political turning points that have taken place without elections being held, both in Italy and abroad. The difference between the democratic alternative, which is what we propose, and the leftwing alternative is evident. The democratic alternative," Berlinguer concluded, "is a blueprint for government including non-leftwingers but still faithful to the republic's constitution. It is for this alternative that the Communists will be working."

PCI AIDE URGES NONINTERVENTION IN POLISH CRISIS

[Unattributed report on PCI Secretariat member Giorgi Napolitano 2 December speech at Romanian Academy in Rome: "Alarming Invocations of 1968 intervention"]

These principles must be firmly reasserted--and we Italian Communists intend to reassert them clearly and determinedly--in view of the critical situation being experienced in Poland. It is up to that country's domestic forces, Napolitano added, to surmount the difficulties, to harmonize the ineluctable demands of thorough regeneration and democratic development made by the workers with the need to tackle a serious economic situation, and with the sense of responsibility which this demands and which the new trade unions must display. And external forces, such as the Western governments, must refrain from interference and distortion.

Nothing could be worse, from every viewpoint, than a growing trend among the Warsaw Pact countries toward a military intervention in Poland. The reference to the August 1968 intervention made by the Czechoslovak newspaper RUDE PRAVO and taken up by PRAVDA can only be considered alarming, even if this reference was made only for propaganda purposes or to exert pressure. Not only the cause of detente and peace is at stake but also principles which could not be violated again without irreparable consequences, at least from the PCI's viewpoint.

Discussing next some remarks about Eurocommunism made by Romanian President Ceausescu, Napolitano said that the parties which have committed themselves to this path certainly did not intend to maintain that it is possible to create a theory of socialism on a "regional or semiregional" basis. They intend to analyze in specific historical terms the experiencs of transforming society in a socialist direction which have been carried out in various parts of the world, but at the same time they express their deep conviction that the development of socialism demands, no matter where, the extension of individual freedoms and political democracy.

Eanes Addresses Nation

["Address to the Nation" by Portuguese President Ramalho Eanes--live broadcast in progress]

[Text] To the site of the accident in which the prime minister, Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro and Snu Abecassis; the minister of defense, Eng Adelino Amaro da Costa and his wife; the prime minister's chef de cabinet, Dr Antonio Patricio Gouveia; and the pilots, (Moutinho de Albuquerque) and (Alfredo Sousa).

We were shocked a few hours ago by the news of the loss of the men who had devoted all their willpower, ability and resolve to the defense of Portugal and the interests of the Portuguese people.

In my capacity as president of the republic, I wish, on behalf of all Portuguese people, to pay tribute to and express profound respect for the memory of Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro, Eng Adelino Amaro da Costa and Dr Antonio Patricio Gouveia.

It is with profound consternation and emotion that I am speaking to you and asking you, without divisions, to honor the memory of these men and to remember their achievements, their democratic beliefs and their patriotic devotion.

To their families I convey my most deeply felt condolences in this hour of grief to which all Portuguese people associate themselves. To the two parties to which Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro, Eng Adelino Amaro da Costa and Dr Antonio Patricio Gouveia gave their best efforts, their outstanding ability and their commitment to the pursuit of their ideals, I convey my profound feelings of democratic solidarity.

To all Portuguese people, whatever their party affiliation and political ideology, in these moments of profound grief and gravity I address my appeal that they cast aside differences and express, responsibly and calmly, the respect we all owe these men who had placed the task of guiding our political life above all other considerations.

The men killed in this accident deserve to be honored with the calm thought and dignity that democracy demands and that the fraternal consciousness of the Portuguese people has always produced whenever a grave moment has occurred in the life of the nation.

The democratic insitutions continue functioning in full. The continuity of the democratic state is ensured at every level. Despite the fact that the government's constitutional structure is based on the person of the prime minister, the stability of the institutions of the democratic state demands that the government should remain in office on this grave occasion, ensuring the continuity of the normal operation of the life of the country under the chairmanship, in terms of the constitution, of Deputy Prime Minister Freitas do Amaral.

In these circumstances I have decided to cancel all my public activities concerned with the election campaign in order to ensure my permanent contribution in the context of my specific role as president of the republic.

I expect all Portuguese people and all political leaders to exhibit the calm, lucidity, patriotism and dignity demanded by our national solidarity.

Do Amaral Praises Sa Carneiro

["Address to the nation" by Portuguese Deputy Prime Minister Diogo Freitas do Amaral--live]

[Text] Portuguese people: The prime minister of Portugal, Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro, was killed earlier this evening in a horrible airplane crash. Also killed were Snu Abecassis; the minister of national defense, Adelino Amaro da Costa and his wife; the prime minister's chef de cabinet, Antonio Patricio Gouveia; and the pilot and copilot of the aircraft.

We still do not know the causes of the accident. They will be determined in a strict inquiry which will begin immediately. It is with the greatest consternation and grief that I am here to confirm this tragic news.

Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro was a great man, a great fighter and a great statesman. He was a great man in the courage of his attitudes, in the radiant sympathy of his character and in the uncommon lucidity of his alert and sagacious mind.

He was a great fighter, and above all a fighter for freedom, before and after 25 April 1974. He died at the height of battle, in the heat of an election campaign to which he had committed himself fully, at the service of a noble cause, of a [word indistinct] ideal and of a more pure concept of democracy that he wholeheartedly wished for our country.

He was a great statesman. He told me in confidence on a number of occasions that only after 5 years would it be possible to find out if he had behaved as a statesman. But we--all of us who served under him in the Democratic Alliance government--can bear witness to the real stature of this leader who showed serenity, firmness and ability at the helm of the state; who understood and tackled with penetrating sagacity and celerity all problems put before him; who would never postpone a decision, no matter how difficult or embarrassing it might appear to be; who was not afraid of assuming full responsibility for the decisions which were made; who always stood on the highest plane of the nation's supreme interests, whether in foreign policy or in the tangled web of domestic politics where, as prime minister, he never showed the slightest partisan bias. It did not take 5 years. His sudden and violent death is the dark backdrop against which we see a true statesman's stature which will remain vividly imprinted in the memories of his countless supporters, adversaries and of the country in general as an example of civic spirit of the first magnitude. History will not forget him.

Also killed in the accident was Adelino Amaro da Costa, the minister of national defense and deputy chairman of the Social Democratic Center [CDS] Party. He was a politician of exceptional ability, a brilliant parliamentarian, and a friend of unsurpassable qualities. The CDS could not owe him more as a leader. And the Democratic Alliance government found in him the first civilian to take over the national defense portfolio after 25 April 1974, a post that had his total commitment and in which he was preparing, with the infectious enthusiasm which characterized him, the transition of the armed forces to civilian control. A word, too, for Antonio Gouveia, a prominent Social Democratic Party militant and outstanding collaborator of the prime minister and of the government, who was always close to the prime minister, even in death.

In the grief of this hour of national mourning I wish to pay, on behalf of the Portuguese Government, moved and grief-stricken tribute to the men who were its prime minister and minister of defense. I am certain that in so doing I am reflecting the feelings of all Portuguese, be they supporters or political adversaries. As a Catholic I pray for God's blessing for all who have died in this accident. And may God give strength and encouragement to their families and friends to hope them turn their enormous grief into a very firm resolve to carry on the work to which they were so committed. Men disappear but their example remains, and the ideals never die for which they fought and gave their lives. Let us therefore carry on.

I ask you all to maintain the greatest calm and serenity. I repeat, I ask you all for the greatest calm and serenity. Let us be worthy in every respect of those who, beyond death, expect from us exemplary courage in such difficult moments.

Workers CP Condemns 'Exploitation'

[Text] A spokesman of the Communist Party of Portuguese Workers [PCTP-MRPP] has given the following reaction to the news of the prime minister's death:

[Begin unidentified spokesman recording] The PCTP-MRPP regrets the occurrence in which Prime Minister Sa Carneiro and those travelling with him have lost their lives.

While regretting it, the PCTP-MRPP must denounce and condemn the political exploitation that the reactionary forces in power immediately started to make of the accident and of the prime minister's death in a subtle attempt to manipulate public opinion and channel toward the candidate of the fascist Democratic Alliance coalition the vote of the undecided or less enlightened Portuguese. This exploitation occurs at the height of an election campaign in which clearly recognizable class interests are clashing.

The PCTP-MRPP warns the public of the need not to allow the manipulation of his respectable feelings and of any grief that the accident that killed the prime minister may have caused.

The PCTP-MRPP denounces and condemns the first manifestations of violence unleashed by persons clearly connected with the Democratic Alliance, namely, this evening's incidents at General Ramalho Eanes's Oporto District campaign headquarters. [end recording]

ALVARO CUNHAL INTERVIEWED ON EANES CANDIDACY

[Joseph Paletou interview on 4 December in Lisbon with Alvaro Cunhal, secretary general of the Communist Party, on the "Let's Talk Straight" program]

[Excerpts] [Question] There will be presidential elections in Portugal the day after tomorrow. Out of seven candidates, five are from the military. Two of them seem to have greater chances than the rest. They are General Soares Carneiro, supported by the Democratic Alliance, which already won the last elections, and the outgoing president, General Ramalho Eanes, who will have the support of the Portuguese Communist Party, support which they say he could well do without. Why have you renounced presenting your own candidate, Mr Cunhal?

[Answer] We have presented our own candidate but, as we have said, it was not the case of a candidate who could win the elections but a candidate who would carry out a campaign and present the real situation in Portugal, so as to prevent the complete takeover of political power by the reactionary forces.

[Question] Had you had your own candidate, you would have been able to count your votes. Isn't that so?

[Answer] Yes, this is your view, but in our view it is a different matter, that of defeating the candidate of the reaction who represents a real threat to Portuguese democracy. You have also said that we supported the candidacy of President Eanes, but this is not the case. We do not support his candidacy. It is not we who presented this candidacy, but the Socialist Party. It was Mario Soares who put forward Eanes' candidacy. Thus, what we think is that the only real way to defeat the candidate of fascism and the reactionary forces is through the election of President Eanes. We do not support his policies but do not see any other way out of the present situation.

[Question] But has General Ramalho Eanes not said that he has nothing in common with you? Doesn't this bother [word indistinct]?

[Answer] Not at all, not at all. This is well known. We know that the Communist Party has nothing in common as regards the objectives, the views on society, social changes, social-economic changes with President Eanes. He has said this, it is true. We also say it. It is precisely the reactionaries and the fascists, as you well know, who immediately say that when there is a democrat who does not play their game, he is a Communist. That is what they now say in Portugal of President Eanes, who in fact is a man with conservative views. But he is the only candidate who observes the constitution, democratic laws and is capable of defeating the candidate of the reactionary forces of what one calls the Democratic Alliance. But in fact it is an illusion to believe them to be democratic forces. The Social Democratic Party in Portugal is a party of the right. The true social democratic party is the Soares Socialist Party. Thus [words indistinct] it is the case of a political battle and it will be fought out by the candidates. This is true, just as you said at the beginning.

[Question] For you, General Eanes is the last hope.

[Answer] He is one hope, one real possibility of defeating the reactionary forces. We do not assume that the nation's problems would be solved through the election of Eanes. Eanes has real possibilities for defeating the reactionary candidate. He is the only one, the only one. Therefore, in our view, although Eanes is not our candidate, he must [words indistinct] although he is not the man (?who would suffice) [words indistinct] with our program, with our political orientation. But he is a man who (?claims to) observe the constitution and democratic freedoms and this is very important for us because in Portugal it is either the case of defending the democratic regime or destroying it as the forces [words indistinct] want to do.

[Question] Isn't it the moment to restore the union of the forces of the left, Mr Cunhal, given the danger, as you describe it?

[Answer] You are right. We Communists have done our best--and we are still doing it--to reunite all of the democratic forces, all of those who want to maintain, defend, consolidate and pursue democratic freedoms, the democratic regime in Portugal. As you can see, unfortunately it was not we who presented Eanes as a candidate, but Soares, the Socialist Party which, in fact, even today officially supports Eanes' candidacy. Therefore, this is a candidacy supported by the Socialist Party, by the Union of the Socialist and Democratic Left--this is another party--by the ASDI [Independent Social Democratic Association] party, a splinter party from the present Social Democratic Party, and by other personalities, among whom, in fact, there are also men whose democratic ideas are quite dubious.

[Question] It is not surprising, however, that there are so many military men competing against each other?

[Answer] No, it is not surprising because the armed forces still have a strong role in the political life of Portugal. It would be kidding oneself to believe that the armed forces are not present in Portuguese political life. It is not by chance that the Socialist Party chose a military candidate. Eanes and the reactionary forces also chose a military candidate, a fascist [words indistinct] also responsible for the concentration camps in Africa, General Sa Carneiro. Therefore it is not by chance that they chose military men. If Eanes wins, we will not celebrate his victory but rather the defeat of the reactionary candidate representing a real threat to Portuguese democracy.

SOARES CARNEIRO INTERVIEWED ON CAMPAIGN, POLICIES

LD041123 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 21 Nov 80 pp 8, 10

[M. Bettencourt Resendes interview with presidential candidate Antonio Soares Carneiro: "If I Became President I Would Never Agree to PCP Joining Government"--date and place not given]

[Excerpts] DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: One of the issues connected with your candidacy that has promoted the most controversy concerns some of the functions which you carried out in the period prior to 25 April. Some newspapers have even raised the possibility of your being denied any public posts because of your associations with the former regime. I would like to ask you whether you have ever been assailed by doubts concerning the correctness of Portuguese politics under the regime before 25 April 1974?

Soares Carneiro: I consider it unfair to talk about Portuguese politics while identifying them solely with a particular regime, rather than discussing Portuguese politics, period. In other words, for centuries Portuguese politics embodied the idea of building a multiracial homeland, which implied securing objectives which present times have rendered unrealistic, but this does not mean that you can say that the national conception of a particular future and blueprint had anything to do with the regime.

This means that persons such as myself, who collaborated in realizing these objectives in Africa but had absolutely no political involvement at home, never identified with or participated in the activities of Portuguese youth or the Portuguese legion, the national union or the popular national action, drawing a very clear distinction between what was in the national interest and perhaps the partisan interests that might be said to have governed this policy.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Regarding future relations with Africa, do you not believe that, if you are elected president, the functions which you carried out in Angola might constitute a hindrance, particularly in relation to that country but also in relation to all former Portuguese colonies?

Soares Carneiro: I do not believe so. The present African goverments are able to distinguish very clearly the bitternesses that may have been created in any fratricidal struggle--which is how we saw it--or liberation struggle--as they regard it--but the future demands above all a thorough understanding of the problem and a responsible attitude from people and their commitment to finding solutions. In this regard my acquaintance with Angola's problems gives me neither a nostalgic colonialist attitude nor a Third World oriented view of what form our foreign relations should take and, as far as I am concerned, gives me the chance to better understand the problems of Angola and the Angolans and to help resolve them.

Significance of 25 April

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: General Soares Carneiro, normally when you talk about 25 April you adopt a cautious stance regarding the date and its significance. Do you not believe that despite innumerable serious deviations that the Portuguese people have suffered, the date still symbolizes the concepts of freedom, justice and progress?

Soares Carneiro: One thing is obvious and that is the democratic option which 25 April represented for the Portuguese people, embodying also to a high degree the significance of a thorough change in our way of life, our structures and our politics. What I have sometimes stressed is that, apart from this aspect of the date, which is of profound significance, there is also a distortion of that significance which, for instance, led the PCP to state that it would "do anything to preserve the April gains." Regarding this appropriation, which I consider wrong and which in no way corresponds to the ideals of freedom and the promises of development and even decolonization also embodied in 25 April, the fact is that some form of restriction must be found. I recognize that it was a date which represented a thorough change, the start of a change which makes it possible to understand the possible nature of a "post-imperial" European Portugal.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Since you are presenting yourself as an eminently national candidate, do you believe that because your main rival is General Ramalho Eanes, who is presenting himself to the voters on the same kind of ticket, it will be difficult to explain this apparent superimposition of election programs?

Soares Carneiro: First, I must tell you that my concern can never be with General Eanes and therefore, I do not consider myself a candidate in opposition to General Eanes. What I do consider myself is a candidate in favor of a certain kind of blueprint. It is very likely that this blueprint will include points of divergence with General Eanes and indeed I am certain that it does. They can easily be identified, and there might also be other points on which the obvious nature of the path to be pursued has influenced us in the same way or directed us toward the same objective. I do not believe, therefore, that you can point to, in any areas of national life--whether regional, local, professional or economic--any unclear ideas regarding my thoughts, my views or my present and future conduct.

Concentration of Powers

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: With a Democratic Alliance government, with an Assembly of the Republic in which the same alliance holds an absolute majority and with a president of the republic whose name might be Soares Carneiro, would there not be a danger of a regime dominated by a single party, with all the possible implications for the Portuguese people, who have already experienced one for half a century? In this connection might you be a "second Carmona?" Or alternatively a "semipresidentialist" president?

Soares Carneiro: Regarding this question, I would not say that I am complaistant, cause it is a very serious one and above all because it involves a large number of people. But I would point out in particular that the term concentration of powers used in this connection is tendentious, to say the least, and that it is used to insinuate that if I were elected, the principle of separate powers would not be observed. I would like to point out, however, that in the latest campaign it was also said that a vote for the Republican and Socialist Front [FRS] was a vote for Eanes and claimed that the FRS identified with Eanes and that if it had won it would have governed with General Eanes, but nobody talked about a concentration of powers, which obviously explains something.

But if we look at countries friendly with us, some of which are governed by parties fraternal with the Portuguese Socialist Party, as inthe case of the Republic of Austria or President Carstens' election in the FRG or Gaullist France, the fact is that in these countries there is indeed an identification among the state bodies and I do not believe that it has occurred to anybody to claim that they are undemocratic or that their leaders do not have a democratic view of society or that they do not observe the principle of democratic rotation. I believe that in our country, as in all countries where democracy must be full democracy, it is essential to establish the possibility of the principle of rotation, and this exists in our country since the division of powers guarantees that the president of the republic will in all circumstances respect the will of the electorate and therefore submit to it, because this is the rule of democratic discipline. Allow me to point out that the contrary happened following the interim elections, when we did indeed witness the emergence of such a negation of institutional solidarity in the clear public announcement, when the government took office, that the government's model did not coincide with the president of the republic's model for society and that the latter was therefore raising certain reservations regarding the wisdom of the will expressed by the voters.

Refusal of Communist Party in Government

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: To return to the initial question, without any provocative intention, you did not mention the possibility which I suggested of your becoming a "semipresidentialist" president or a "Carmona...."

Soares Carneiro: I accept that there is no provocative intention in the question. However, I do not believe it is a kind comparison to make--nor could it ever be. I would point out that during the latest campaign it was said both that I was insignificant enough for Sa Carneiro to put me in his pocket and that I was big enough to sink the Democratic Alliance. The discrepancy between these claims raises some doubts regarding not only their wisdom but also the responsibility or otherwise of the attitudes behind them....

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Still in this connection, you are supposed to have said that if the Democratic Alliance did not gain a majority you, as president, would dissolve Parliament. If this assertion is correct, would you explain it?

Soares Carneiro: I am pleased that you have given me this opportunity to explain matters. I never said that. I never said anything of the kind. I believe that it is the duty of a truly democratic country to accept the results of elections, which is a real imperative.

What I did tell a particular newspaper was in answer to a clearly academic question regarding whether, in the event of a change in the nation's life, I would accept a coalition government between the Socialist and Communist parties; I said I would not and that under such circumstances I might even go as far as to dissolve the Assembly of the Republic. But it was a purely academic hypothesis, partly because it was known that Mario Soares himself rejected outright any kind of association with the Communist Party.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But if such an association between Socialists and Communists were created freely by those parties and if they held a parliamentary majority, would you, as president of the republic, still refuse to accept such a government?

Soares Carneiro: This is precisely where I stand: I would not accept it, because the Communist Party is not a democratic party; it is a party whose conduct is clearly antidemocratic and therefore cannot be associated with any other party in shouldering government responsibilities. Experience and history show that the Communist Party, whenever it manages to infiltrate or to occupy centers of decisionmaking--and in this case they would be political decisionmaking centers of supreme importance--renders any country's democratic blueprint and realization impossible.

I absolutely refuse to remain complacent in the face of such future prospects and would be dutybound to turn to the vote expressed by popular sovereignty, to the vote which lies at the root of all sovereignty, so it could truly state whether or not the intention was to maintain such a majority, which would create such situations.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: But let us suppose--another remote hypothesis--that the Communist Party won the elections by an absolute majority. Your position would be different in that case....

Soares Carneiro: It would be no different. In such a position of extreme confrontation the only option open to me would be to resign.

Tolerance and Consensus

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Recently you have been issuing insistent appeals for tolerance and consensus. What is the precise political significance of these appeals?

Soares Carneiro: The term tolerance has primarily a very profound ethical meaning. Tolerance, which is an essential rule for coexistence and one which enables all Portuguese citizens to live together, implies above all that after elections nobody must form any preconceptions or what I wuld rather call, instead of preconceptions, a kind of defect in relations which would lead them to oppress the vanquished or even to try to crush them. I consider this an essential stance because it relates to a matter of fairness in which I perceive several different aspects. There is national consensus, which corresponds to a blueprint which must unite all Portuguese people, and there is the consensus of the political forces, which corresponds to the nature of relations among the party forces.

Therefore when I refer to consensus, it is a national consensus inasmuch as, in view of the challenges which the future holds for all of us, it would be unacceptable for certain Portuguese citizens to be deprived of the major responsibilities which these challenges must imply for all of us as a community, to participate in the effort to build such plans for national objectives, which will enable us to surmount these challenges and above all to aim at a lifestyle suited to our time and our customs.

PCP PROTESTS 'NATIONAL ABDICATION' TO U.S., NATO

LD041217 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 27 Nov 80 p 2

[PCP Political Commission 24 November "not": "PCP Opposed to Portugal's Transformation Into Armed Fortress of Imperialism"]

[Text] 1. The issue of foreign military bases and installations on Portuguese territory, including the possible deployment or transit of nuclear weapons, has taken on a new and dangerous dimension in the past few days.

Indeed, statements made both by acknowledged representatives of imperialism and by members of the Sa Carneiro government have confirmed the existence of secret negotiations on military plans which, if implemented, would transform Portugal into an armed fortress of imperialism, with very grave consequences to the country's independence, sovereignty and security.

2. As both the PCP and other democratic and peace-loving forces and individuals have been warning and proclaiming, these plans and negotiations of the "Democratic Alliance" government are aimed specifically at granting further large-scale "facilities" to the United States in the form of military bases such as those at Lages and Beja, the construction of a network of oil pipelines at the service of NATO, the permanent installation of U.S. aircraft carriers on the Tagus or in another of our country's ports, increased military spending and the Portuguese Armed Forces' growing subordination to foreign commands.

Within this framework of the subordination of national interests to the aggressive interests and plans of the United States, NATO and imperialism as a whole, the demarches, consultations and negotiations aimed at the deployment of nuclear weapons in our country or even the transit across national territory of vehicles carrying such weapons are particularly grave.

It is absolutely essential to declare that the implementation of these plans for the deployment or transit of nuclear weapons would expose Portugal to terrible dangers and would, in the event of an accident, create the possibility of large-scale and tragic losses of human life and incalculable material destruction and damage; or even the total destruction of our country in the event of a conflict. The implementation of such a plan would also create a permanent state of insecurity in collective national life and would inevitably involve a large increase in unproductive expenditure.

3. In view of the growing popular protest and indignation prompted by such plans and in view of the reservations, uncertainties and worries which such an attitude prompts in very varied political sectors, the parties of reaction and the leaders of their government have been trying to disarm the vigilance of national opinion on this issue, which is of vital national concern.

The truth, however, is that the circumspection and studied ambiguities with which they broach the issue, far from removing or attenuating the existing legitimate and justified concerns, have in fact fully confirmed that the "Democratic Alliance" government is planning behind the Portuguese people's backs and against national interests, further steps toward involving our country in the warlike strategy of U.S. imperialism. The Sa Carneiro government is thus preparing to authorize national territory to be transformed into a base for aggression against other peoples and countries, and at the same time to be converted dangerously into a priority military target in the event of a future nuclear conflict, the possibility of which is the subject of persistent propaganda by the U.S. militarist strategists themselves, who identify not U.S. territory but the European Continent as the supposedly "limited" theater for such a nuclear war.

This is in fact a shocking policy of national abdication and an outright conspiracy against Portugal's independence and the Portuguese people's security, which elementary principles of national dignity and patriotic pride demand be actively unmasked, combated and defeated.

4. It is to justify and cover such a policy of national abdication and betrayal and of subservient collusion with imperialism that the reactionary forces and their government are stepping up their actions of propaganda and ideological distraction with a view to imparting a false, fatalistic and catastrophic outlook on the international situation, brandishing the insidious bugbear of an alleged "Soviet threat" so as to excuse the exclusive responsibilities of imperialism in exacerbating international tensions, its attempts to reintroduce a cold war climate, its intensification of the arms race, its struggle against the detente process, its attacks on the peoples' inalienable rights and its threats to peace.

5. Practice has already shown, with an abundance of evidence, that the Sa Carneiro-Freitas do Amaral government cannot be expected to adopt stances in the least compatible with the interests of national independence, dignity and sovereignty. The active support for the decision to deploy the new U.S. Pershing II and cruise missiles in NATO countries; the breaking off of cultural relations with the USSR and active participation in the anti-communist and anti-Soviet campaigns orchestrated by imperialism on the pretext of events in Afghanistan; the support for imperialism's policy in the Middle East and in particular the breaking off of relations with Iran; the involvement in maneuvers to obstruct and sabotage the Madrid CSCE conference; these are some examples which prove that in foreign policy the "Democratic Alliance" government and its foreign minister behave not as bodies of an independent and sovereign state but as mere representatives of the U.S. State Department, the Pentagon and the most aggressive NATO circles.

6. The PCP stresses once again that Portugal's independence and security are to be ensured not by submitting to imperialism but through a policy of patriotic pride, national independence and peace and friendship with all peoples; not through a policy aimed at intensifying foreign relations with the United States, the EEC and the major imperialist powers, but through their diversification; not by "strengthening Portugal's participation in NATO" and encouraging the arms race, but by fighting for detente and peaceful coexistence.

7. The PCP urges the workers, democrats and all patriots and peace-loving people to be vigilant with respect to the reactionary government's maneuvers and to intensify in varied ways the struggle to prevent the attainment of its rash and irresponsible plans to strengthen imperialism's military bases in Portugal and particularly to deploy nuclear weapons in our country.

A broad movement of opinion and action for these objectives is essential and can defend Portugal's independence and security and help Portugal, by safeguarding the international prestige which it gained through the April Revolution, to contribute actively and responsibly to the cause of peace, cooperation and friendship among the peoples.

MINISTER REVIEWS SHORT-TERM ECONOMIC PROSPECTS

LD041617 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 23 Nov 80 pp 46-47

[Jose Antonio Martinez Soler interview with Spanish Minister of Economy and Trade Juan Antonio Garcia Diez: "Employers Ask for More Freedom, but not Sincerely"]

[Excerpts] Question: What are the government's predictions for the Spanish economy in 1981?

Answer: Our estimates for next year center on a real growth which we hope will approach 2.5 percent, supported by a degree of recovery in investments and a 13-14 percent increase in retail prices. This presupposes that unemployment will continue to increase in 1981, though at a considerably lower rate than in 1980. And we hope that next year's balance of payments will be similar to this year's, which will close with a deficit of about $5 billion. Of course, all this is subject to uncertainty regarding what might happen in the oil markets and to the evolution of the world economy.

Question: What are your forecasts for the medium and long term?

Answer: As things stand it is very difficult to make any forecasts beyond 1981. Unless there are major changes in the world economy in 1982-3 we could achieve a 4-5 percent growth rate, which would enable us to halt the rise in unemployment and even to start reducing it.

Question: Do you not think that our economy could grow 4-5 percent without creating and jobs, by increasing productivity and replacing manpower by capital?

Answer: Of course, our historical experience shows that at a growth rate over 4 percent the Spanish economy is capable of generating employment. Though Spain has created very few jobs, even in years of considerable growth, I am sure that the envisaged 4-percent target will create employment. I have few doubts in this regard.

Question: Do you believe we have touched bottom and that a slight reactivation has begun in economic activity, judging from the latest available data?

Answer: Indeed, what I have just said stems from the fact that our economy is starting to show slight signs of recovery, from the third quarter of 1980. The impetus of a fairly good harvest, some specific forms of consumption and a relatively relaxed monetary situation could explain this increased rate of activity. A couple of months ago we were expecting a real growth rate for 1980 close to 0.5 percent, but now we are raising our forecast closer to 1 percent.

Question: Your remarks conflict with the OECD's latest forecasts for the Spanish economy. What grounds do you have for differing from the OECD?

Answer: I believe that the OECD experts are wrong this time to take such a pessimistic view of the Spanish economy. They are wrong because they based their estimates on older figures than we did, undoubtedly using the data of the second quarter, which was a very bad one for our economy. However, more recent data confirm my thoery of an incipient recovery. This year's harvest and industrial production support what I say.

Question: Are there any measures envisaged for creating new jobs and consolidating existing ones?

Answer: The government has very clearly presented its aims in this field. Increased employment is based, first, on a major increase in public investments and, second, on increased private investments, and here the government's action is centered on housing and energy. The rest must come about through the stimulatory effect on the economy of the following three areas of action: public investment, housing and energy.

Question: What will the monetary policy for 1981 be, and what is your forecast for the evolution of credit to the private sector?

Answer: The important thing in this connection, to achieve the stimulatory effect which I just mentioned, is to maintain a nonexpansionist but at the same time non-restrictive monetary policy, which will permit a growth in real terms of credit to the private sector. Our idea would be to maintain a growth rate of about 17 percent, which would enable us to increase credit to the private sector by over 18 percent, with an estimated inflation rate not above 13 percent, due to the deflationary effect of the GDP [en terminos de deflactor del pib], which would mean a real increase in credit of about 5 percent. And we believe that this is compatible with the policy of combating inflation, though the two objectives might seem contradictory.

When we refuse to increase public investment above the levels envisaged in the budget, we do so for two reasons: because we are reaching the limit of what the administrative machine can achieve--because of a lack of planning and skill--and because to go any further would create such serious financing problems for us that they could only be surmounted by throwing in the towel in the anti-inflation struggle.

Question: What will you do to contain current expenditure and to increase public investment?

Answer: The containment of current expenditure depends, as I said earlier, on the proper implementation of the zero-base budget [presupuesto base cero] and the budgets for the various sectors. We must be fully aware what we are spending the state's money on, and we must revise many forms of administrative activity which might prove unnecessary and which entail considerable expenditure. As for spending on public investments, it cannot be increased more than is envisaged for 1981. Such high growth rates in investment cannot be maintained indefinitely, and they will have to be modified for 1982 and 1983.

Question: How do you plan to finance the deficit?

Answer: Financing will take the traditional form through the following two methods: the supporting of a national debt at the highest level permitted by the budget law (120 billion pesetas and 70 billion pesetas of foreign debt) and, inevitably, the recourse to loans from the Bank of Spain. The fact that these are the only two methods open to us makes it very difficult for us to accumulate a greater deficit and therefore to increase public investment.

Question: What will happen to the peseta in the present context?

Answer: The peseta's exchange rate is affected by the tremendous impact that the second oil crisis has had on us--a $12 billion oil bill--which we have to finance at current prices. The exchange rate is also affected by our country's inflation rate, though the relative position has improved considerably in recent months.

I believe that there must be no traumatic revaluations or devaluations of the peseta and that it must follow market stresses, with the Bank of Spain intervening only to smooth out excessive fluctuations. This has led us to a major depreciation of the peseta and, together with the behavior of inflation, to a considerable improvement in the competitiveness of our exports. This will very soon be reflected in the balance of payments. The recovery in the competitiveness of our exports leads us to expect a current deficit in 1981 not much greater than this year.

Question: What philosophy do you intend to apply to the new prices for energy products? When and how large do you expect the next increase to be?

Answer: At the moment I cannot tell you either when or how large, but I can assure you that it will have to be very soon--definitely before Christmas--and that prices will increase in accordance with a lucid philosophy. The new increase must be consistent with the tax revenue envisaged in the budgets and with recovering the increased costs of importing, refining and distributing oil. Furthermore, the increase will be virtually the same for all products derived from oil, so that in relative terms diesel oil, for instance, will increase more than gasoline, though in absolute terms they will increase by almost the same amount.

Furthermore, world uncertainty regarding oil continues owing to the continuing war between Iran and Iraq. When war broke out we were in an excellent position regarding stocks, but in 1981 we will be in a much tighter situation, though we are making great efforts at least to ensure our supplies. Then there is the problem of prices, which have now reached the worrisome levels on the open market of about $40 a barrel--which could again disrupt the entire economic policy of the Western world.

ARMY CHIEF INCREASES ARMED FORCES' READINESS

LD0141816 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 4 Dec 80

[Text] The commander in chief of the armed forces has increased readiness in the Swedish Armed Forces in connection with the events in Poland.

The Swedish Government also decided today that the 200 conscripts, who are to be demobilized from the navy on approximately 10 December, could be recalled at short notice. This is due to the fact that the shorter conscription service creates reductions in ordinary readiness.

Apart from the navy, the increased readiness also applies to the air force.

HIGHER-LEVEL EC-SWEDEN TALKS SUGGESTED

LD041627 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 19 Nov 80 p 6

[Text] Outgoing EEC Chairman Roy Jenkins has proposed that one of the two annual meetings of the EC-Swedish Joint Committee be replaced by higher level consultations, namely, between EC Commission members, on the one hand, and Swedish ministers, on the other.

Also, the framework for such meetings should be extended to cover not only the functioning of the free trade agreement but also broader trade and economic questions.

Jenkins said this at a press conference in Stockholm yesterday.

MORNING STAR URGES NO INTERFERENCE IN POLAND

LD041241 London MORNING STAR in English 4 Dec 80 p 1

[Editorial: "Continue the Discussion"]

[Text] Readers of the MORNING STAR will have been following with very close attention the development of the situation in Poland since the signing of the Gdansk agreement.

The problems created by the mistakes committed by the previous Communist Party leadership, the corruption that was evident in public life, had led to a very serious political crisis.

This has been frankly admitted by the Polish Communists, who have set out to seek a solution to the difficulties in the country through negotiations and discussions with the new unions.

The meeting of the Central Committee which has just finished has reaffirmed this approach and taken important decisions aimed at carrying it forward.

It is only natural of course that for a long time after socialism has been established, there will be those who do not accept the socialist basis of society. But it would be wrong to see the crisis in Poland as the result of the activities of such anti-socialist elements.

The Polish Communist Party itself has made it clear that what happened was a mass movement of protest from the working class against the failure of the government to carry out its pledges.

As a Central Committee member, Ryszard Wojna, put it in a recent article in the Communist Party daily, TRYBUNA LUDU: "In its own way, the Polish working class reminded its own political system of the dictatorship of the proletariat."

Anti-socialist elements can only be defeated by a continuation of the process of discussion and negotiation and political struggle through normal democratic means.

Poland's economy undoubtedly faces very serious difficulties and the country needs all the help it can receive. But it is important that all aid given shall be dis-interested and without strings.

The Polish workers have to solve their problems in their own way, without any interference from outside, from wherever it may come, and whatever form it may take.

LEFTWING LEADER ON INTERCOMMUNAL BORDER QUESTION

NC050845 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 5 Dec 80 pp 1, 7

[Excerpts] If the House of Representatives wants to play its role to ensure the refugees' rights, it must protect the talks, it must do everything possible so that they may be continued in a spirit of good will and mutual understanding. This was declared in the House yesterday by leftwing House member and PEO Secretary Gen A. Ziartidhis.

A. Ziartidhis was addressing the House on the question of "ensuring the inalienable rights of the refugees and the role of the House." In his brief but persuasively documented address he stressed, among other things, the following:

During the talks there will be discussions on the question of borders that will define the regions to be under Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot administration. In his proposals, Makarios had delineated the borders. Without these talks, or if the talks fail, the refugees' rights cannot be ensured.

In order to prevent any misinterpretations from the start, I wish to further explain the question of borders. In 1977, when Makarios suggested the delineation of 20 percent of the area to be under Turkish Cypriot administration, he was charting the borders between the two constituent parts of the geographical Federal Republic of Cyprus. From the moment we accepted the solution of a geographical federation--we have done well to accept it--a question of borders exists. There are borders in a cantonal federation, as well as in a biregional and in a bizonal federation.

The question is not whether or not borders exist; the question is what kind of borders will exist. We say that the borders will not operate like the borders between states, such as the borders that separate Greece from Turkey, or France from Italy, or India from China. They will not be borders with passports, customs control and duties; but they will be borders, a borderline that will define the region to be under Turkish Cypriot administration and the region to be under Greek Cypriot administration.

This borderline, which will define where the administrative area of one part ends and the administrative area of the other begins, which will be the interstate borderline, must be discussed. And it will be discussed at the talks as a substantive question--so substantive that if all the other specific issues are resolved and this question is not resolved, the Cyprus problem will not be settled.

Why did I dwell on the question of borders? Why do I say that this is a substantive question? Because it is directly related to the question of the refugees' return. The return of the refugees to their villages, their cities, their homes and to their property and business will depend, to a large extent, on how correctly we will resolve this problem.

Do not think that I have forgotten the question which we are debating, the ensuring of the refugees' inalienable rights and the role of the House. I do remember it. And I believe that in order to ensure the refugees' rights, if the House wants to play its part, it must protect the talks, it must do everything possible for their continuation within a spirit of good will and mutual understanding.

If the problem of the refugees is to be resolved--as we want to resolve it--this will be done at the negotiating table.

The House must adopt a stand. It must clearly adopt a stand toward the issue: either the talks succeed and the Cyprus problem is solved in a fair and democratic way--and with the dignity of our people as a whole unharmed--or the talks fail, the Cyprus problem remains unresolved, the refugees remain refugees, the missing persons continue to be missing, and Varosha remains a ghost city. The House must adopt a stand: the refugees' rights cannot be ensured without the holding of talks or if the talks fail.

It has been said that unfortunately the talks are not taking place between the Greek and the Turkish Cypriot communities, but between Cyprus and Denktas as Ankara's proxy; and Ankara, in its turn, as a proxy of the broader imperialist interests.

Mr President, Colleagues: this is neither a discovery nor a disclosure. Denktas' dependence on Ankara, and Ankara's dependence on NATO are well known. All this is a reality and if we have seen it only now, probably this is why we are suffering.

Well, Denktas is dependent on Ankara! Yes! But it is with him that we have to negotiate. It is with him that we must hold the talks. We are not the ones to appoint the Turkish Cypriot community's interlocutor. If the Turkish Cypriots appoint someone else, we will talk with him. I do not say that such a thing has been said by anyone, but if there is anyone who will suggest or thinks to suggest that we interrupt the talks because Denktas is Ankara's proxy and Ankara is the imperialists' proxy, we disagree with him. We talk with those we have to talk to, with those we are obliged to talk with.

It has been said, Mr President, and we agree with the person who said this, that the House does not want to learn the details regarding the handling of the Cyprus problem. As a matter of fact, if we had asked to discuss the details here we would look ridiculous and we would be destroying the talks.

But someone might ask: What about the principles, the principles on which the talks are being held? Is the House not interested in them? Of course we must be interested in them. We know that the principles on which the talks are being held are those of the 4 guidelines agreed upon between Makarios and Denktas, and those of the 10 points in the Kiprianou-Denktas agreement. We are also aware of the UN principles and resolutions.

Is there any information that our interlocutor has deviated from these principles? Is there any information that the interlocutor has committed himself to something contrary to these principles? This is said because it has been inquired "what commitments have been undertaken."

If there are such reports, the House must meet in camera and later, if this is found necessary, in open session in order to hear of any deviations or of any unacceptable commitments.

However, we must say that we do not have such information. We must say that the interlocutor enjoys our confidence. Moreover, we must say that the House itself cannot conduct negotiations. It cannot stand behind the interlocutor in order to give him instructions as to how he will handle this issue or the other issues to be raised during the talks. This is the job of the executive authority with the counsel of the National Council where all the parties are represented.

The return of the Kyrenians, as well as of all the refugees, will depend on the solution of the serious problem of rapprochement, of the reconciliation of the common man of both communities. It will depend on the extent of the eradication of the existing hatred--because hatred does exist--of mistrust and of fear. It will depend on whether or not chauvinism will cease to distort the feelings of the common man of both communities.

DENKTAS CRITICIZES GREEK CYPRIOT STAND ON TALKS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the insistence of the Greek Cypriot side on enosis--which they deceivingly call their national cause--is impeding progress in the Cypriot intercommunal talks. President Denktas was speaking at a dinner of the Lefkosa [Nicosia] Rotarian Club. Addressing the members of the club, Denktas reviewed the developments in the Cyprus problem since the 1950's, recalling that the Cyprus problem results from Greek Cypriot views which considered Cyprus as an extension of Greece and from aspirations of enosis. President Denktas said that the Greek Cypriot side still insists on this stand.

Noting that the Greek Cypriot side continued their struggle in a bid to transform the Turkish Cypriots into a minority, Denktas said: We have reached a point in the intercommunal talks in which we are telling the Greek Cypriot side to resume partnership. We are also proposing a formula in order to reestablish this partnership, calling for a bizonal federation. Denktas said that although the Greek Cypriots agreed to this formula in principle, their insistence on enosis--their basic stand and case--impeded progress in the intercommunal talks. He added that the demand of the Turkish Cypriot side was the recognition of its basic rights.

Referring to rumors that concessions were being made [in the intercommunal talks] President Denktas said that this was not true and that bilateral concessions would be considered in the event an agreement was reached. Pointing out that eastern and western imperialism as well as Greece were interfering in the Cyprus issue in favor of the Greek Cypriots, Denktas said that currently the big powers continue to be closely interested in Cyprus. Recalling that UN resolutions on Cyprus were impartial, President Denktas said that the Turkish Cypriot side would not bow to these decisions.

RIZOSPASTIS CRITICIZES KARAMANLIS ON REPATRIATIONS

[From the "Radical" column: "Crippled Democracy"]

[Text] Speaking at Tripolis, President K. Karamanlis stated that he wished to contribute--not only formally but also substantively--to the unity of the Greeks. He completed his statement with a pledge: "I will do all I can to fulfill my mission and vindicate the people's expectations." We would not like to doubt the president's intentions, but we recall that in 1974 when he was prime minister, he promised during election meetings to bring about "democracy for all Greeks." Six years have passed since then and 35,000 Greek political refugees living in socialist countries are still deprived of the right to have a homeland, while a large number of them do not have citizenship either. There cannot be "democracy for all" when it either deprives or condones the depriving of these two inalienable rights for tens of thousands of Greeks--even minors and infants--in order to punish them for the political ideas of their parents or grandparents. This is a very crippled democracy. During the 6 years it has been in power, the New Democracy Party has failed to rid itself of intolerance and has not resolved the problem of repatriating political refugees so as to keep a permanent source of anomaly in the country's public life. Of course, the president of the republic does not govern, but we believe that the supreme office in the country gives him the power to effectively use his influence to resolve this huge humanitarian, social, political and national issue. Moreover, without satisfying or even seriously attempting to satisfy such popular and national demands, there cannot be any talk about "unity of the Greeks" or "vindication of the people's expectations."

WEU ASSEMBLY DEBATES COORDINATION WITH NATO, EC

[Unattributed report: "West European Union Parliamentarians Debate French, British Deterrent Forces' Role"]

[Text] The West European Union [WEU] Parliamentary Assembly, which sits at the Palais d'Iena in Paris, partially adopted on 2 December the recommendations made by Mr van Hassel (West German Christian Democrat) who called in particular for the establishment of a working group to strengthen the Atlantic alliance's "European pillar" by means of a better coordination of NATO, EEC and WEU activities. The resolution, adopted by 33 votes to 24 with 3 abstentions, urges the European countries belonging to these three organizations to "take all initiatives and measures likely to encourage as close a participation as possible of their activities in implementing the objectives of the Brussels Treaty" (which founded the WEU.)

The working group will be examining in particular the possibility of a meeting of WEU defense ministers before the NATO meeting.

The parliamentarians rejected, however, a resolution to establish a link between the WEU Assembly and the European Parliament, specifically through an exchange of observers. It was judged inopportune to urge the European Assembly to legislate on defense matters which, according to the Treaty of Rome, are outside its sphere of responsibility.

In the afternoon French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Pierre Bernard-Reymond warned the assembly that France "does not intend to delegate to others the task of judging to what level it should take its effort to update its national strategic force," because "the value of the contribution which the French forces make to the alliance's global deterrent capacity remains a function of the independence with which it is carried out and of the freedom to modernize it."

The French secretary of state thus distanced himself from the report delivered by Dutch Christian Democrat Mommersteeg, scheduled to be debated by the assembly on Wednesday, on "SALT and the British and French Nuclear Forces." This document advocates, among other things, that patrols by French and British missile-launching submarines be coordinated so that both countries can permanently keep a total of four submarines on station (at present this number could drop to three) and also that France coordinate with NATO's general staff its policy on selecting objectives.

The Defense and Armaments Committee, on whose behalf the report was presented, concludes that the French and British forces "contribute to the efficiency of allied deterrence" but that it "cannot specify to what extent," since this efficiency would be judged greater "if they were allocated to NATO and if there were coordination in the choice of objectives."

OFFICIAL, MEDIA REACTION TO POLISH CRISIS REPORTED

Genscher-USSR Envoy Meeting

[Text] Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher received the Soviet ambassador to the Federal republic, Vladimir Semenov, for a lengthy talk in Bonn today. The talk focused mainly on developments in Poland. According to the Foreign Ministry, Genscher explained the statements of the European Council of 2 December in Luxembourg, in which the EEC heads of state and government had clearly warned against Soviet intervention in Poland.

According to the Foreign Ministry, Semenov briefed Genscher on the decisions of the Warsaw Pact states at the recent Moscow meeting, in which the East bloc heads of state and government expressed their conviction that Poland could itself cope with the difficulties in the country, but also stressed that any attempt to depart from socialism would be firmly opposed.

Genscher in an interview yesterday spoke in favor of economic assistance for Poland by the Federal Republic and the other EEC countries as well as the United States.

Genscher Call for Aid

[Text] Bonn, 7 Dec (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher spoke out on Sunday for the Federal Republic, its EC partners and the United States to provide economic aid to Poland. In an interview for Second German Television he said there is a duty to provide such aid if it helps to stabilize the situation in Poland. It is to be hoped that the Polish people could solve their political problems themselves. Nobody should interfere in that.

Asked about the possibility of intervention by the Soviet Union in Poland, Genscher referred to the statement on the Soviet incursion into Afghanistan, issued at the German-French meeting in Paris, that the policy of detente could not stand up to a second blow of that kind. Asked about an alternative to the policy of detente, the federal foreign minister said that there is no sensible alternative. He believes that it is appreciated in the Warsaw treaty capitals that cooperation is of fundamental interest for the East as well.

In an interview for Polish television to mark the 10th anniversary of the Warsaw treaty between the Federal Republic and Poland, Genscher said that both sides can be satisfied with the result of the normalization process during this decade. Without this great and historic step the Helsinki CSCE would have been inconceivable. In that sense this treaty was of central importance for Europe.

SPD's Bahr Comment

[Text] Bonn, 6 Dec (DPA)--Developments in Poland are being followed in the Federal Republic with "apprehension and sympathy" according to Egon Bahr, SPD federal business manager. Bahr said on Southwest Radio on Saturday that this sympathy applies especially to the agreed course of rejuvenation and reforms. The apprehension is whether all parties involved have and will retain the strength and sense of proportion "required by the art of the possible." He hoped that it will not be regarded as undue interference, the SPD politician emphasized, if he were to add that some of the matters agreed between the new trade unions and the government appear unattainable in the short term.

As an example he mentioned the 35-hour week. However desirable, the German economy too is unable to achieve that target in a day. Concerning the strike question Bahr said that to withhold labor is the workers' strongest weapon. It will have to be used "with circumspection, care, a sense of proportion, and according to fixed self-imposed rules."

Reviewing the Warsaw treaty, signed 10 years ago, Bahr stressed that this set of treaties is no longer contested. It is questioned neither by a new political leadership in Poland nor by the opposition in the Federal Republic. Nevertheless, he regretted that hitherto it has not been possible to create between Poland and the Federal Republic youth exchanges on the German-French example. Concerning the German/Polish schoolbook recommendations which are not yet in force in all the laender, Bahr said that it would be an "act of demonstrative solidarity" if the various ministers of education were to be more effective in the attempt to reach a common language as regards the history of the two countries.

DGB Leader Remarks

[Text] Stockholm, 7 Dec (DPA)--The trade unions of the Western world do not intend to exert any ideological influence on the independent Polish trade union Solidarity, Heinz Oskar Vetter, chairman of the German Trade Union Federation, emphasized on Sunday at the end of a 2-day visit to Stockholm where a DGB delegation had held talks with the leadership of the Swedish trade unions.

The free trade unions were trying, Vetter said, to help the new Polish trade union build up its organization. The Swedish trade unions had been asked to take on this task on behalf of other trade unions. However, there was to be no ideological interference.

In reply to questions, Vetter said that if he were to advise the Polish trade union leader Lech Walesa, he would recommend that he not become financially dependent either on foreign countries or the church. The setting up of independent trade unions was a "purely Polish situation," which made it legitimate vis-a-vis all the parties concerned.

Vetter added that at the meeting of German and Swedish trade unionists questions on the formation of wealth and subsidies were discussed, among other things. Growing Japanese car exports were a worry, but the principle of free trade should be maintained.

[Press review on developments in Poland]

[Text] HESSISCHE NIEDERSAECHSISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel notes: Reprieve or a short grace period for Poland? The text of the communique in the Moscow summit meeting permits both interpretations. Communist Party chief Kania was ordered to report, receiving the blessings of the East bloc leaders to overcome the current difficulties himself. No doubt, however, this also contains orders to reestablish the leading role of the Workers Party and to guarantee Poland's belonging to the socialist camp. So it is a mission that can be turned into an ultimatum at any time when the Kremlin believes that the ideological unity is threatened.

FRANKFULTER RUNDSCHAU Asks: How will the majority of the independent trade union Solidarity react in such a case? Lech Walesa, the workers' idol, seems to have realized that solidarity with some politicial groups could become a problem of existence for the whole organization.

Should he remain silent if some opposition people are taken out of circulation, he could lose more than his personal reputation. If he risked some widely organized resistance, without knowing whether the masses of trade union members would follow him, he would risk a Soviet intervention.

MANNHEIMER MORGEN stresses: Not just the Polish party leadership is under pressure to make a move, the Soviet party leadership is also under the same pressure if the Kremlin does not want to put the iron East bloc discipline at stake in connection with Poland, thus risking the deterioration of its East European satellite imperium. But the Polish affair is different from the 1956 revolt in Hungary and the 1968 crisis in Czechoslovakia. In these cases Moscow was dealing with the rebellious party leadership. In Poland, however, the whole nation is fighting for more rights and more codetermination rights vis-a-vis the ruling party, which has adopted the role of an incapable employer. An occupation of the country would hardly be justifiable ideologically, and militarily it would be a bit dangerous too, because the populace would most likely put up decisive resistance.

FDP PARTY CONGRESS OPENS IN MUNICH 5 DEC

[Excerpts] Munich, 5 Dec (DPA)--FDR Chairman and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher today opened the 31st ordinary FDP party congress in Munich with an emphatic declaration of support for the SPD-FDP government coalition. "The coalition will not founder because of us," Genscher stressed in his speech before 400 delegates in the Bayernhalle. The party chief, who comes up for reelection this afternoon, strongly warned the FDP against putting at risk what had been achieved during the coalition talks. "As far as we are concerned, things will be left well enough alone and nothing will be added; there will be no rocking of the boat and no carping," Genscher said. The FDP had been elected in order to govern and not to lament. With reference to critical voices within the SFD who were already thinking aloud about Chancellor Schmidt's successor, Genscher emphatically declared his support for the head of government. "We for our part have elected Helmut Schmidt as federal chancellor for a further 4-year term." The Free Democrats wanted to govern with the new Federal Government "and not engage in intrigues against this government."

In his remarks on international affairs Genscher pointed out that the situation in Europe and the world had become more threatening. There had been setbacks in the relations between the two German states. Nonetheless, the FPD was for cooperation and against any delimitation. It would make every effort to prevent additional disturbances arising from the relations between the two German states which could worsen the overall atmosphere between East and West. Genscher warned against the illusion that relations between the two German states could be preserved as a kind of "good weather region" if the relationship between East and West was to enter a bad weather zone. "There is no separate German role between East and West." he stressed. The Federal Republic was part of the West but there was a special German responsibility for peace and cooperation in Europe.

Concerning developments in Poland Genscher said that it was the sole business of the Poles themselves to decide which road they wanted to follow. No one had the right to interfere. He warned the USSR and its allies especially against interfering in disregard of the Helsinki Final Act. At the same time he emphasized the FDP's desire for arms control, arms limitation and disarmament.

[Roundtable discussion in the Bonn ZDF studio with Hans Apel, federal defense minister, representing the SPD; Manfred Woerner, defense expert of the CDU; Juergen Moellemann, FDP defense spokesman in the Bundestag; Hans Klein, defense expert of the Bavarian CSU; and journalists Ulrich Mackensen of FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU and Wolfram von Raven of DIE WELT; with Johannes Gross as moderator--live]

[Excerpts] [Gross] Mr Federal Minister, how secure is Western Europe anyway?

[Apel] Since you put this question to me so directly, I will say that we here in Europe live securely because NATO, despite some problems which doubtless exist within it, too, is solid. NATO is working together, the balance is being maintained albeit with difficulty. We live securely because we have undertaken to make our contribution toward the balance and because our opponents, especially the Soviet Union, is perfectly aware that it would be a fatally dangerous risk to consider or wage warlike conflicts here in Europe. On the other hand, this does not mean that developments outside of Europe fail to have any impact on Europe directly or indirectly. All we need to do is think of the situation on the Persian Gulf. We are still largely dependent on oil imports, which makes us realize how strongly world politics influence our well-being and thus also the destiny of Europe.

[Woerner] Well, I believe that the description given by Mr Apel is a bit too optimistic. I cannot subscribe to it. It is definitely true that no war is looming ahead here in Europe, simply because the risk to the Soviet Union is still too high. Nor can I imagine that the Soviet politicians want to invade Europe. But we must clearly see that two tendencies exist which increasingly jeopardize our security. One is the increasingly worsening military power ratio here in central Europe, and also worldwide, to the disadvantage of NATO, to the disadvantage of the West. I think there is no doubt about that. The second tendency comprises all the developments which Mr Apel has indicated: the impariment of our oil supply, the situation in the Middle East. After all, security must not be viewed exclusively militarily. Security stands for much more. If our oil tap was turned off it would spell the doom of the Western industrial nations. I believe that the advance the Soviet Union has made into the Middle East, or to the Gulf, via Afghanistan, jeopardizes our security very much. To this day the West has not found an adequate answer to this problem.

[Moellemann] It is probably correct to say that we are facing new challenges. I am, however, not very worried because I think we can handle them just as we have handled the old ones in the past. It was the policy of the past several years to try to counteract these challenges using a complex of measures. The Western alliance, NATO, has adopted a NATO long-term program which is now being put into practice. It creates the military preconditions for keeping down the small danger of a military conflict here. Through parallel efforts we are trying to curb the further explosion of arms capability, and if possible even to reduce them. This is a hard task, but we must do it.

With respect to the area referred to by both Dr Apel and Dr Woerner, NATO, in my opinion, is in the process of seeking a strategy--as is the EC. This strategy is as yet nonexistent--the strategy of how to exert influence on problems outside the alliance area which may well have direct repercussions on us so that military conflicts do not take place in that region. And surely a contribution to this end is the constantly intensifying cooperation with the states of the Third World, also in that region.

[Klein] If we could avoid giving the impression that Moscow's threats and its enormous armament impress us, we might possibly save a lot of money when it comes to the military budget.

[Von Raven] The question was asked how safe are we. I believe that we are still safe from a war even if the balances of forces is deteriorating more and more, and I agree with Mr Woerner on that. It seems to me, however, that in peacetime we are not sufficiently protected against pressure; we react more than we act.

[Apel] Well, a few remarks to Mr Klein. Let us begin with the Soviet Union. I think the Soviet Union is in a good position to correctly assess real structure, real political structures as well as real military structures. If it were otherwise, it would be more simple for us. We could set up Potemkin villages and that would help us. But it does not. The Soviet Union can correctly assess the influence of parties. It knows very well that at their party congresses the Social Democrats support the security policy of the Federal Government with an overwhelming majority.

I do not contest the fact that there are minorities in our country. I do not even want to criticize that. Mr Mackensen has pointed this out, and I am for a frank discussion of matters. Recently we began to discuss matters of [Bundeswehr] tradition in the Bundestag. Social Democrats have made mistakes there to. Maybe they have made life unnecessarily difficult for me, and maybe I have done the same for them, but I am in favor of that debate. I am in favor of democratic parties continuing to agree on the basic structures of security policy. That is an enormous advantage for this country compared with almost all our West European neighbors where Christian democratic parties, socialist parties and other parties get out of control. Thank God it is better in our country.

One remark with regard to Mr Mackensen, I can agree to a certain extent with him. I do not allow the existing potential to impress me too much, although I agree with Dr Woerner that we must keep an eye on it. But if we look at the structures in Eastern Europe at present--I am speaking in general terms on purpose--we see that not everything is a sign of strength. What we see also demostrates the internal situation of a country, the spiritual, economic and political situations there. So we have to be very careful so as not to handle security policy in such a narrow way that it becomes only defense policy. The citizen must find his social claims reflected in this democracy. That is part of security policy.

[Woerner] I do not think anybody contests that. But when I look at the situation in our nation I do not think it is an exaggeration to say that the will for defense, which is also important for the security of a country, has plainly deteriorated. The number of conscientious objectors is increasing, there is a certain naive pacifist trend gaining ground, about which Ehmke said correctly that it will probably characterize the dispute here in the Federal Republic in the coming decade. The increasing figures with regard to neutrality which show up in opinion polls are symptoms.

I must frankly say that this concerns me. One cannot simply say: Well, basically everything is still alright. We must give some thought to doing something. The dispute Mr Apel must have in his party in this connection is certainly very important. I do not want to blame one party. However, it is certainly impossible for us to maintain that we claim, as I do, that the Bundeswehr and an effective defense are prerequisities for peace policy, prerequisities for making an attempt to decrease tensions, while at the same time diligently working in dozens of meetings to cast doubts on the Federal Republic, meetings in which parts of the DPD and FDP, the Judos [FDP youth group] participate. I do not want to emphasize the problem of the public military oath, however. I am for discussions. I am also for discussions with the young generation even if they are hard and critical. But I am against yielding to the pressure of certain forms of protests, of irritation and the like.

[Apel] Nobody does that.

[Woerner] I hear that with satisfaction. We will see once the debate has come to an end.

[Apel] Colleague Woerner, I debated that yesterday with my aides, and we have set a date in later April. This shows we will not be forced into a debate by recent events. It will be a very broad debate which will also deal with questions of society. We decided, without asking you, that Dr Woerner, Mr M[illegible]mann, Mr Ehmke and others would have to be included.

[Moellemann] We live in a dilemma at the moment. This can be felt very strongly in every discussion, and not only with young people. It is pointed out that we have to make relatively high expenditures for our security every year. It is also stated that in the fields of arms control and disarmament we are trying to get the continuous escalation under control through reasonable discussions with our adversaries. People say thank God we have not had a war for 35 years. And some of them cannot master this dilemma. I feel that we must make efforts to reason with the people and explain to them the connections between our foreign and security policies. That is our task, I believe. We must not try to convince people by criticizing their way of thinking; we must reason with them. Maybe we have all neglected this somewhat lately.

[Gross] Mr Federal Minister, what about the disproportion between the combat potential on the Eastern side and the defense options on the Western side?

[Apel] I will be brief, Mr Gross, because otherwise I would deprive others of too much time, and particularly time for contradiction. I think it is an uncontested fact that the Soviet Union has always been conventionally superior, especially when it mobilizes the reserves it has in its own mother country, something the experts refer to as the second echelon. By the same token it is undeniable to me at any rate , that the conventional defense capability of the West has increased and continues to improve, not least on the part of the Bundeswehr through new weapons systems, through the improvement of the augmentation capability, through reserves and many other things.

This is how it must be, because if we become too weak conventionally--we need to grow stronger conventionally--then the next deterrence component, namely the Eurostrategic component, must be used--the threat from nuclear weapons having their effect on, and from, Europe. In this field, and this is a fact, the balance is disturbed by clear armament, an advance armament, by the Warsaw Pact. These are missiles with a range of more than 4,000 kilometers which have great precision; missiles which are mobile, cannot be spotted and which will be deployed in the countryside in case of tension and emergency. This was the reason for the dual NATO decision of 12 December 1979 which is often also referred to as the arms gap closure. It contained an offer to the Soviet Union that said: All we want to do here is just have deterrence take effect, but we would much prefer achieving an arms control agreement with you. The talks have been started; but we must not jettison our firm determination to close the arms gap if we desire an arms control success.

Then there is a third field which involves the ultimate weapons: the intercontinental missiles. As a result of SALT II there is a chance for parity in that field. Yet in this respect the Americans will be called upon to do more. Let me add one more sentence. [Gross interrupts]

[Gross] Who have not yet ratified SALT II.

[Apel] True enough, but I think we are not in a position to give a new administration public advice. That would be rather silly, I think. But let me add this one sentence. The conclusion I reach is this: Here in Europe things are just about in order, though I will admit that peace, detente, balance are indivisible and that this looks difficult to other governments in the world.

[Woerner] Well, Mr Gross, we have discussed motivation. That is one of the spheres involved, and I can only contradict the defense minister. We simply cannot ignore the fact that the superiority of the Soviet Union has grown in the past decade--also here in central Europe. The gap between our efforts and its efforts has increased. This is dangerous, not immediately with regard to peace, but with regard to our becoming susceptible to blackmail. If this continues, the use of military power in peacetime will increase more and more for exerting pressure, for blackmail and to simply let these things have their effect.

You can see at the moment how the Soviet Union is setting up a massive military scenario around Poland to exert pressure. This is a sign that military power can be used not only in a war but also in peacetime to achieve a certain effect. (Unintelligible interjections]

Just a moment, just a moment, may I finish my sentence. I want to add that a threat does not must mean the use of military power in a war but also in peacetime.

There is a third thing I must add: The efforts we will make this year obviously do not suffice. That must be said. We have made a clear commitment in the alliance, and it does not look like we will keep it. Cuts are about to be made with regard to the Bundeswehr on matters we decided on together, matters the government demanded and parliament agreed to, matters which will be cut now. In other words. we will once again weaken our security. I think that must be said, particularly in such a discussion. I believe this contains dangers for the political independence, freedom of action of the Federal Republic and in the long run also for the policy of peace.

[Mackensen] If I may answer you, I would say that what you have just said is not logical to me. If you wanted to prove that the West Europeans are becoming more and more exposed to blackmail, citing as evidence that the Soviets have problems with Poland at the moment, it is evidence to the contrary to me. Evidence to the contrary because the Warsaw Pact, leaving Romania out, obviously has so many internal problems that it must use the force o of arms in its own sphere of influence--maybe as in the CSSR in 1968--thus causing an international reaction. That does not seem like evidence to me.

Just one more remark. You mentioned the growing conventional strength of the Warsaw Pact. We all agree that it exists, but one can cite the simple military principle that an attacker--some American generals maintain that the ratio must be 4 to 1 or 5 to 1, maybe 3 to 1 is acceptable--must be superior in order to have a chance. That has not happened either. I do not want to belittle anything, but the internal unrest of the Warsaw Pact is not a threat to the West, but much rather a threat to the Warsaw Pact itself.

[Apel] Let me make a remark too. I cannot logically follow either what Manfred Woerner has said. The Soviet Union has used its military means for internal bloc affairs--in 1953 in the GDR, in 1956 in Hungary, then in the CSSR, hopefully not in Poland. That was mainly at a time when the CDU was in power and nobody can tell me that this was a sign of NATO's weakness then.

I grant you and I agree with you, Colleague Woerner, whenever the Soviet Union can take a military stroll--Afghanistan--it goes for that stroll. This must be prevented through security policy, which costs money.

By the way, I do not know of systems that will be stopped or slowed down. I can tell you that I am gladly prepared to outline my problems to the Defense Committee which, I believe will hold its constituent meeting next week. I would ask to do so, but it does not make sense to only be pessimistic. I admit that we have financial problems everywhere, not merely in the defense budget. But let us not give the impression that it is so bad that it does not pay to spend money on defense because we are too inferior anyway. [unintelligible interjections]

[Klein] I would like to say a few things about the strolls of the Soviet Union and your third point. Occasionally we express concern and give attention to Afghanistan, Yemen, Somalia and the hand the Soviet Union has in various developments in the Near and Middle East. But I see no consequence whatsoever that we have drawn from this. I have no strategic plan for such cases; and I am not advocating action by the Bundeswehr somewhere outside Europe. But I could imagine, for example, that our very plausible and noble sounding principle of no German arms to crisis areas is something that has to be looked at. I am speaking for myself, Mr Moellemann, and we are a very liberal party [laughter, commotion]

[Gross] Go on, Mr Klein, don't let Mr Moellemann irritate you.

[Klein] Just imagine: No arms to crisis areas, that could mean in many cases that we would abandon our friends in their hour of need, the states siding with us and our policy. It can also mean--but I do not want to mention names of states so as not to complicate matters--it could also mean that we could supply other help to such areas, such as financial aid, with which they would then buy their arms in Moscow or Prague with money made available from your budgets. So I really think when we speak of Soviet military actions and the necessity to counteract them that we should also consider, for example, what should be done so that the threat to our raw material and energy sources in the Near and Middle East or Africa is sufficiently taken into account.

[Moellemann] I have nothing against somebody expressing his personal opinion, I do it often enough myself, and sometimes it is rather boring. But I reacted in such a surprised way because I know from the work of the Defense Committee and statements by Colleague Woerner that our careful and restrictive position in this field is being supported by both parts of the Union. It need not necessarily be bad. I think we will be well advised to adhere to it. It has not only the potential advantages mentioned by you. High foreign policy risks are always involved in various undertakings. If you supply somebody with arms, you are supplying him against somebody else. We try to have good foreign relations with all states if possible. In addition, there are domestic political implications--the growth of a large arms industry. One must be very careful, and I do not believe that we really want that.

As regards your question, if these challenges mentioned here are as you describe then it is very important for the Western alliance as a whole to find the proper answers to the problems that have recently appeared. For this reason, surely, what will be discussed at the forthcoming meeting of the NATO Council of Ministers will be highly significant.

With a view to the field that you, colleague Klein, mentioned, this has been done in the past few months. We have not merely talked about Afghanistan, but we have spent a lot of money, for example, to prevent a repetition of Afghanistan. We discussed in much detail in the Foreign Affairs Committee what foreign policy conclusions were to be drawn and the intensified cooperation with the states of the Third World. Right now 111 states, which is more than did so the first time, have called on the Soviet Union to pull out without delay and completely. They are still there, but the demand has been raised so that the Soviet Union is constantly worsening its standing, its position.

We need to discuss in the alliance the extent to which our American partners, and perhaps also our French and British partners, will be relieved here in central Europe by us and the other European states in the event they, owing to their different tasks, have to take additional measures in other regions of the world. Beyond that we also need to discuss the question of whether all alliance partners, apart from a percentage increase, are doing what needs to be done when it comes to content and quality. The question is justified not only as far as the Federal Republic is concerned but pertaining to the entire alliance.

The chancellor pointed out, and I think justly, that in the United States, for example, consideration of reintroducing general conscription is surely necessary. I have gained the impression from the initial utterances by the new U.S. president and his advisers that consultations will become even closer than they have been between the Americans and Europeans to date. Surely this is necessary, and I think that we do have a good chance of coping with the problems. In that respect I am not so skeptical, Colleague Woerner.

Mr Mackensen is absolutely right. It is not necessary for the defender--we are a defensive alliance, we have a defensive army--to be just as strong as a potential aggressor. Let me say that the state of affairs which you rightly described as being such that we are not threatened by war is, after all, the consequence of the fact that we are adequately strong, and we are doing everything to keep it that way.

[Woerner] I would like to note a couple of things. To begin with: We want peace, all of us who are here. We want arms control and, if possible, disarmament. But all of us know that we have a chance of attaining that only if we have a fairly stable power ratio here in Europe.

But for years I have been hearing the same thing, and we know that this is a fact: Year by year basically nothing is done which needs to be done. But year after year we take consolation in the finding of Mr Moellemann that things are still working well. As far back as 5 or 6 years ago, Mr Moellemann, I read in NATO statements, which were not signed by our ministers but by SPD ministers, that the power ratio was just barely adequate. The warnings at ministerial conferences become constantly more unqeuivocal while we here do window-dressing in discussions like ours.

Let me tell you something about the alliance. The new U.S. administration has been mentioned here, and rightly so. Rough times are ahead for us. The new U.S. administration, and this is clearly evident, will demand that we make good on our promise. The Americans are fed up with assuming the burdens, additional burdens, for protecting our oil reserves as well. After all, we Europeans depend on the Middle East and on the oil supplied from the Middle East for more than 50 percent of our total; I believe in our case it is 55 or 57 percent, whereas the Americans' dependence is only 20 percent. And the Americans, Mr Apel and Mr Moellemann, will probably feel as I do and tell us quite plainly: We are prepared to do something extra, yet we expect you to relieve us in Europe in return. We must provide an answer to this problem. The Americans will no longer allow us to pretend that we were doing something while we do nothing at all. This is why I am taking a look at what we are doing; what counts here is figures, although I definitely believe that defense cannot be pursued with money alone. Still, money is a very important factor, and the budget which I hear is under preparation at the moment is not sufficient to fulfill this requirement. The consequence will be tensions in the alliance. This can be easily predicted. [words indistinct]

[Gross] But these are questions concerning the defense minister.

[Apel] Mr Woerner, there is no window-dressing. However, I am just as strictly against out painting a gloomy picture. It is obvious that this allinace is running the risk of becoming an alliance of divergent membership characteristics, and in saying this I actually do not mean us. On the contrary. We rather run the risk of turning into a prominent partner, more prominent than a number of other European countries which I will not name here. These countries must be told: Dear friends, the decision on the closure of the arms gap is not a topic concerning just a few, it is also your topic. You adopted it unanimously, therefore consequences ensue.

Rough times ahead--well, this may be true. There may well be a heated debate with the new U.S. administration. I am not afraid of waging that debate, as long as it is a debate among equals. It will not do for us to be told what the score is. This is an alliance of sovereign, equal states, even though the Americans surely are a bit more equal than we are. But they must take our interests into account as well. We are a divided country, and despite the treaties we have the open flank of Berlin. This means that a balance of interests will be necessary, everybody meeting the other halfway. I am convinced that this will be possible.

My last remark on the 1981 budget we have discussed before: We are 14 days away from the first discussion of the federal budget in the cabinet. We are 2 months or 6 weeks away from the first reading of it in the Bundestag, and we are more than a year away from the final accounting for 1981. I really believe that we should not grow impatient, that we should not wage a budget debate at a moment when the problems have not become discernible even in outline.

Let me say a sentence concerning motivation. Mr von Raven, with public opinion polls it is neither here nor there. There is also another public opinion poll which says that 80 percent say NATO must exist. That is fine. I believe that public opinion polls also lend themselves to manipulation. What matters, and there I expressly endorse your view, is that the young generation must be told that peace is not a foregone conclusion. The youth are a generation to which peace is something that goes without saying; they have never seen anything else. Even I as an elderly gentleman [Moellemann interrupts]

[Moellemann] Well, you are fishing for compliments now.

[Apel] Only vaguely recall--oh well, please keep in mind that two-thirds of my life is over, this is true, unfortunately--this terrible period. So they need to be told that peace indeed is not a foregone conclusion. It must be earned each day anew. They need to be told another thing too: Dear friends, there have been 120 wars in the world since 1945. We estimate that there have been at least 20 million casualties. Why have there been wars everywhere with the exception of where two pact systems full of arms are facing each other? That has something to do with peace and detente policies, but also with the balance of forces.

[Woerner] Had you said that everywhere and particularly in your party, you would have done a great service to all of us.

[Apel] Come now, dear Mr Woerner, we are not in the election campaign any more, take it calmly.

[Woerner] This has nothing to do with the election campaign.

[Apel] Mr Woerner, I will send you the election program of the SPD with a personal inscription for you like the second reason to vote SPD.

[Woerner] I think the election campaign is over.

[Apel] Yes, quite right, we dealt with that in the election campaign and it really does not make sense to be polemical here. My God, we agree that security policy means defense capability and a balance of forces as a basis for detente policy.

[Gross] One small additional question in connection with the problems touched on by Mr Woerner--you say rightly to the Belgians, the Dutch, the Luxembourg people and the Danes.

[Apel] I did not mention any names.

[Gross] Certainly you are committed to greater international courtesy than I am. You said that there is a certain decision and you must abide by it. Without wanting to deal with the debate on the federal budget and its details, how about the Federal Republic of Germany? Will we completely fulfill the 3 percent commitment, the 3.0 commitment, or will we not?

[Apel] First, in order to be intellectually absolutely honest, I want to point out what NATO decided on. NATO decided that all member states will "strive"--that is the NATO decision--to increase their defense expenditures by a real 3 percent, that means after subtracting price increases. That is the exact decision. It does not make sense to interpret it differently. Second, in the past decade and also in 1981 we more or less implemented it. The year 1981 has not yet begun. We should fight the battles of 1981 when they have to be fought. And as the defense minister I am grateful for the help of Mr Moellemann, Dr Woerner and my own faction. That is all fine. You asked me casually, and I still remember it: Can't you use 1 billion more, Mr Minister?

[Woerner] I did not ask that, but I could have. [laughter]

[Apel] I will tell you, Manfred Woerner, I could use it.

[Woerner] Well, all right, but just a moment. We do not want to treat it only ironically, although I am all for irony. We, as the opposition, have offered the government for 3 years now our support for such decisions. We said that you cannot expect us to lead the way. In a division of labor the opposition cannot be expected to handle the unpopular matters and the government the popular ones. We have made this offer to the government and the offer still stands. I am curious whether the government will now produce the corresponding figures. Mr Moellemann has used his words--I am being ironic now, too--saying that the FDP will be particularly insistent in this matter. Let us see what will come of it. We are facing interesting budget debates.

MULTIPLE NUCLEAR WARHEAD CAPABILITY ANNOUNCED

[Text] France has tested the prototype of a three-stage missile equipped with a multiple nuclear warhead, Joel le Theule, the minister of defense, has announced. This M4 rocket will be equipped with six nuclear warheads of 105 kt each, with a range of 4,000 km. It will equip the sixth French nuclear submarine, which is expected to be put into service in 1985. With this France becomes the fourth power after the United States, the USSR and Great Britain to become equipped with multiple nuclear warhead missiles.

FRANCOIS-PONCET, USSR ENVOY DISCUSS POLAND

[Text] Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet this morning received the USSR ambassador to Paris, Stepan Chervonenko. Their meeting dealt with the situation in Poland. JAPANESE MINISTER ARRIVES FOR TALKS ON EXPORTS

NC071102 Paris AFP in English 1158 GMT 7 Dec 80

MAXIME GREMETZ CRITICIZES FORM OF AID TO CHAD

LD041607 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 28 Nov 80 p 9

[Text] PCF Politburo member and Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz was interviewed yesterday on Paris Radio's "Frankly Speaking" program.

Asked about the situation in Chad he said, among other things: "We are opposed to all forms of intervention. But I note that there is much talk about Libya.... One of the reasons for that could be to justify further French intervention...." "France has already intervened twice in Chad. It exacerbated the splits within that country and left when it was unable to do any more. Now four Jaguars have just landed in Libreville. Questions can therefore be raised."

With regard to cooperation Maxime Gremetz stressed that a great deal was being granted, but to whom? To new multinationals, which will plunder the African countries' national wealth. "None of these countries," he said," was able to develop while French capitalism was present. We are in favor of real cooperation. The multinationals must no longer dominate and plunder those countries."

Next Maxime Gremetz stressed that France has an opportunity to develop cooperation involving respect for independence and national sovereignty and the chance for the partner countries to freely exploit their natural resources. "France is now turning its back on this kind of cooperation," Maxime Gremetz said.

"[Cooperation Minister] Robert Galley was very careful not to say to whom the French aid is going. The people being helped are the Lafarge Cement Company, for instance, and Pechiney-Ugine-Kuhlman. They make huge profits, exploit a cheap labor force and sell their products here, while enterprises are being closed and French workers thrown out of work. As far as we are concerned, real cooperation means cooperation based on the mutual interests of the French workers and of the peoples of developing, especially African, countries."

NEW DIRECTOR OF INTELLIGENCE AT SDECE APPOINTED

LD041419 Paris LE MONDE in French 26 Nov 80 p 12

[Text] Col Jacques Sylla Fouilland has become director of intelligence at the Foreign Intelligence and Counterintelligence Service (SDECE), the French secret services of which Alexandre de Marenches has been director general for the past 10 years.

He succeeds Col Alain de Gaigneron de Marolles who resigned from this post less than 1 year after he had been appointed to a position whose holder's rank is deemed equal to that of division general.

For about 2 years Colonel Fouilland has been deputy to the SDECE director general and, in this capacity, has had to deal with the service's main dossiers and to accompany Mr de Marenches on several of his trips abroad. The position of deputy to the SDECE director general was specially created for Gen Rene Candelier who occupied it between his leaving the position of deputy director of military security and his appointment as director of intelligence in the secret services, a post he held from 1977 through 1979.

Following Colonel Fouilland's recent appointment as director of intelligence, the post of deputy to the SDECE director general will not be filled.

LE MONDE ON SIGNIFICANCE OF BY-ELECTIONS OUTCOME

LD051301 Paris LE MONDE in French 2 Dec 80 pp 1, 9

[Raymond Barrillon report: "A Warning to the Government"]

[Text] Although it is never appropriate or accurate to make comparisons between elections which are different in nature and scope, the results of the seven parliamentary by-elections on 23 and 30 November nonetheless constitute a warning to Mr Giscard d'Estaing and Mr Barre with only 5 months to go before the presidential election.

Since the president's and premier's popularity ratings have been negative since September, the ballot boxes agree with the opinion polls in revealing dissatisfaction and discontent: The only party which unreservedly supports the government's action in all spheres has lost three seats, two of which have gone to the PS, an opposition party, and the third to the RPR, a party in a state of permanent dissidence.

Since the die was cast in Gironde, where only the PS was still in the running, and since the left no longer had a candidate in Doubs, it is not surprising that the percentage of abstentions was higher in the second round than in the first of all seven constitutencies: 53.81 percent as against 42.93 percent.

In four of the five constituencies in which there was a straight fight between the majority and the opposition there was, however, less indifference on the part of the voters: 45.47 percent abstained in Ain as against 52.37 percent [in the first round]; 30.05 percent abstained in Aveyron as against 30.87 percent; 34.71 percent abstained in Cantal as against 36.84 percent; and 32.87 percent abstained in the Dordogne as against 38.29 percent.

In all these five constituencies the opposition won a total of 110,908 votes, in other words 53.77 percent of the 200,226 votes cast; the majority, if there still is a majority, only totaled 95,318, in other words 46.22 percent.

The PS, which easily retained the second Dordogne constituency and the fourth Gironde constituency, owes its victories to perfect transfers of votes. In Cantal Mr Souchon obtained 51.02 percent of the votes although the total left plus the extreme left only represented 48.84 percent of the votes on 23 November. In Ain even more ground was gained (from 45.37 percent to 57.48 percent), since Mr Ravassaro apparently enjoyed support from the first round ecology voters.

The instructions to step down which the PCP issued reluctantly and without abandoning its bitter criticism of the PS were observed to the letter by the Communist voters. This is a failure for the PCF leadership's strategy but a less spectacular failure than the one they suffered in the second Aveyron constituency, where they advocated abstention and where Left Radical Movement candidate Rigal was nonetheless elected with 57.12 percent of the votes cast, even though the total opposition votes cast in the first round amounted to only 56.05 percent. It is justifiable to conclude from this that 3 years and 3 months of incessant quarrels among the former Union of the Left partners have not damaged the hopes and unitary desires of the voters who favor the opposition.

The aggravation of the dispute between Chirac and Giscard supporters seems, on the other hand, to be worrying the majority voters to a fairly serious extent. In the second Ardeche constituency RPR candidate Perbet only obtained 55.98 percent of the votes cast although on 23 November he and UDF candidate Arnaud totaled 56.96 percent. Conversely in the third Ain constituency some of the RPR voters seem to have contributed to the Socialist candidate's victory, since UDF-Social Democratic center candidate Cormoreche only obtained 42.51 percent of the votes cast while in the first round he and the candidate supported by Chirac's party totaled 45.36 percent.

Since the narrow victory of the independent candidate in Doubs, who was supported by the RPR over the UDF (816 votes between them) implies the transfer of leftwing votes, it is possible to talk of connivance if not "convergence" between Socialist and Gaullists, and that is exactly what Monday's L'HUMANITE does. Disregarding the leftwing voters' discipline, L'HUMANITE takes pleasure in condemning the "intrigues and arrangements being made between the right and the PS."

In the 1978 general election the results were known in the first round in Ardeche, Cantal and Doubs, and on 30 November 1980 the majority was out of the running in Gironde. Therefore it is only possible to study the change in the majority and opposition positions in the Ain, Aveyron and Dordogne constituencies. In all three constituencies the opposition received 55.19 percent of the votes cast on 30 November (69,852 out of 126,566) as against 53.90 percent (96,223 out of 178,501) on 19 March 1978. It has gained 1.29 points. With 56,714 votes out of 126,566 as against 82,278 out of 178,501, the majority has dropped from 46.09 percent to 44.80 percent.

These variations are, of course, limited, but that does not alter the various lessons to be learned from the series of elections whose significance the Elysee and the Hotel Matignon would be wrong to disregard.

MORE ON BERLINGUER'S VIEWS ON NEW GOVERNMENT

AU061947 Rome ANSA in English 1930 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Text] Rome, 6 Dec (ANSA)--The recent Communist Party (PCI) call for an alternative leftwing government to replace the present Christian Democrat dominated administration is not a turnabout in Communist strategy, according to PCI Secretary Enrico Berlinguer.

In an interview to appear in the PCI daily UNITA tomorrow Berlinguer said that those who claimed the "historic compromise" was dead and buried did not know what they were talking about. They were referring to a mere caricature of the historic compromise, picturing it as a pure government formula, a power deal worked out between the Christian Democrats and the Communists, he said.

In fact, the historic compromise is its search for an agreement among various components of Italian society and history, and therefore among various classes, Berlinguer continued. It is not Communist strategy that has changed, but the situation in Italy, he went on.

For the first time in thirty years the risk of an institutional crisis bordering on the collapse of the republic has become a reality, Berlinguer said.

To stop this collapse and to put a halt to the widening gap between the nation and its institutions, the people and the ruling classes, a positive shift is needed that will avert any slide into dangerous and unknown waters, he said.

"This is why we moved," Berlinguer continued. "If Italy is to be kept from sliding towards becoming a second or third class nation, the people must be asked to make great sacrifices and put out a great deal of effort. Does the DC have the authority to do this? In simple words, this is the Italian political problem today," he said. It is not by calling for a strong man that this problem can be solved, but by allowing the PCI to be the thrust behind a greater guarantee of a government that expressed all of the healthy forces within Italian democracy, the communist leader continued.

As to the polemics over delays and disorganization in earthquake relief aid, Berlinguer said that the Communists had not sought to provoke a government crisis [word indistinct] not to create a power vacuum, but that the government seems to be making the "absurd" request that nothing be said about responsibility at all.

As to the prospect of early elections, Berlinguer claimed that conservative and rightwing forces might try to push the country in the direction of an authoritarian solution. Other forces are pushing for early elections with an entirely different scheme in mind he said; for example, that of placing blame for Italy's ills on both the DC and the PCI so as to tout the centrality of a phantom-like third force. In his view, the latter would only create a dangerous vacuum, split the left and fuel the DC's rightwing.

He was harsh in his judgement and the DC, which has governed the country for thirty years and has in large part confused itself with the state.

Berlinguer said that it was necessary to combat the DC's power system to the finish. However, this fight must be conducted in such a way as not to push the entire DC to the right. The DC's best forces should not be humiliated, he continued. Instead, new prospects should be opened to it to prepare the way for an initiative of internal renewal, Berlinguer ended.

The government will be meeting today to assess the situation resulting from the election results. This will also be the subject on the agenda of a meeting to be held today or tomorrow by the Council of the Revolution, according to council spokesman Vitor Alves.

The spokesman described the election result as a sensible decision by the Portuguese people, adding that once more the people have imposed on the leaders themselves their will to see democracy and freedom become reality in this country of ours.

Eanes Victory Speech

[Statement by Portuguese President Antonio dos Santos Ramalho Eanes made at election campaign headquarters in Lisbon on 8 December--live]

[Text] My victory, my reelection, is the victory of democracy. In a manner that I regard as exemplary and, I would have thought, without leaving margin for doubt in anyone's mind, the Portuguese people have given proof of their capacity for impartially assessing the facts and values of the political life of the country.

My commitment to all--I repeat all--Portuguese without exception, now as in 1976 is laid down in my reelection program. This commitment will guide my activity and will determine my political attitudes in the course of my new mandate.

I am in no way influenced toward the parties and organizations which recommend the vote for my reelection. What there is, as I have always stated, is a pledge of political confidence vis-a-vis the parties that supported my bid for reelection and whose support I expressly and publicly accepted. These are the Socialist Party, the Independent Social Democratic Association, the Social Democratic Movement and the Reformist Action Group; in short, the forces that claim to represent social democracy and democratic socialism.

As I have always stated, and this could never have been in doubt in a democracy, I shall guarantee all--I repeat all--the legal conditions in which the democratic majority government and the democratic majority coalition will be able to operate.

My action will continue to be guided by the major goals which governed my first mandate and with which the Portuguese are familiar. That is, balance, independence, and moderation in all circumstances and conditions and, seeking through this moderation, to contribute to the resolution of the crises and problems that are to be expected in a democracy.

Above all I shall remain the guarantor of democracy and of national unity, of social stability and of the convergence of efforts in all matters essential to the Portuguese and to their democracy.

All this will now become easier because my reelection shows to those who still might have doubts on that score that the bipolarization theses put forward to explain Portuguese political phenomena are neither valid nor consistent.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I would like to see the Portuguese display serenity, tolerance and respect. I wish this Portugal of ours to belong to all the Portuguese, and I will conclude with a phrase I have been repeating throughout the campaign: Let us all in Portugal be concerned with ensuring that democracy and its inherent values--freedom, justice, social fraternity and national identity--may make of our country a country in which there are only Portuguese of a single class, that is, first-class Portuguese. [applause]

Soares Carneiro Comments

[Report on statement and news conference given by General Soares Carnerio, presidential candidate of the Democratic Alliance, on 8 December in Lisbon--recorded portions enclosed within quotation marks]

[Excerpts] At about midnight the candidate supported by the Democratic Alliance, General Soares Carneiro, held a news conference at a Lisbon hotel during which he referred to the civic spirit displayed by the Portuguese, made brief comments on his campaign program and also congratulated General Ramalho Eanes on the election returns, which so far point to his reelection:

"My words are of satisfaction at the civic spirit displayed by the Portuguese on electing the president of the republic. This civic spirit provides further proof that our country is capable of revealing in its difficult hours the greatness that will ensure its perennial existence, a fact that comforts us and gives us even greater reason for wishing to serve it with complete dedication and resolve.

"I already have a reliable indication of the choice the Portuguese people have just made by giving General Eanes the victory, such has been the popular verdict. It remains for me to compliment General Eanes and express the hope that he will honor the pledges made during his campaign: the pledges to collaborate with the government, to respect the democratic parties and not to make concessions to the Communist Party. It is now important--more important than ever--to do our utmost for the consolidation of the democratic regime in accordance with the undeniable feelings of the Portuguese people."

During the news conference, a Portuguese television journalist asked Soares Carneiro if he thought that the deaths of Sa Carneiro and Amaro da Costa had influenced the electorate:

"Dr. Sa Carneiro was buried yesterday and I would not like to bring the memory of this worthy statesman so soon into the political limelight. But I must recognize that the emotional shock caused by his disappearance may have unleashed currents of [words indistinct]; therefore, it seems that it may somehow have worked in favor of General Eanes' reelection."

Asked how he viewed Ramalho Eanes' victory in the first round, Soares Carneiro said: "I would like to say that the popular verdict imposes full acceptance and I have no reservations with regard to the grounds on which this verdict has been reached. It represents the will of the nation as expressed in these elections. The result has surprised me as I really did not expect the figures that the present trend seems to indicate."

POLISH UNION LEADERS COMMENT ON STRIKE ACTION

LD061450 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1300 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Hector Arenas dispatch from Barajas Airport]

[Text] For the first time, a delegation from the Polish trade union, Solidarity--founded by the top Polish trade union leader, Lech Walesa--has arrived in Spain. Jozef Przybylski, a member of the Interfactory Committee in Gdansk--where the new Polish labor movement began--and Zygmunt Zawalski, from the Lenin shipyards are the leaders who arrived in Madrid this morning.

In their first statements they said that they do not believe in the possibility of a Soviet armed intervention if the situation continues to worsen. They said that support for Solidarity is very strong since two-thirds of the Polish labor force already belongs to the union. Regarding the calls by Walesa and the Communist Party in the past few hours for national unity to bring an end to the strikes and set about economic reconstruction, they said that the strikes were the last resort of the workers to make their grievances heard: We do not want strikes. They have been imposed by the internal situation, by the lack of union freedom; we are determined to go forward because our activities are legal and recognized juridically. They explained:

[Begin recording] [Unidentified voice in Polish fading into Spanish translation] They realize that only they can improve the situation in Poland. They want to work and want to get production going again. They do not want strikes. The strikes were imposed.

[Second unidentified voice, in Polish fading into Spanish translation] This is a last resort entirely, the only thing left to do when one cannot do anything else. [end recording]

The Solidarity leaders, who before arriving in Madrid were in Lima and Caracas, said that they are satisfied about coming to Spain--at the invitation of the workers' trade union--and that on this occasion they will not make any specific request for support for the Polish free trade union from Spanish workers. They said: We are a new trade union. We are interested in learning and in having contacts and an exchange of labor experiences.

WALDHEIM INVITES ROLANDHIS, ATAKOL TO NEW YORK

Spokesman Denies Invitation

NC061520 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1425 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Text] The government spokesman has stated that the press report that UN Secretary General Waldheim conveyed a fresh invitation to Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Turkish Cypriot Atakol to go to New York and hold separate discussions with him on promoting the intercommunal talks is untrue. The spokesman said that Gobbi did not resurface the invitation for Rolandhis and Atakol to proceed to New York. The matter, he continued, is at the point that was referred to in a relevant statement by the foreign minister. The spokesman added that regardless of this, the issue of Rolandhis' going to New York, as the minister himself had stated in his latest meeting with the journalists, is being studied by Rolandhis in agreement with the president of the republic. However, the spokesman concluded, no decision has been made yet.

Rolandhis Favors Talks

[Excerpts] According to reports by I SIMERINI, the Cyprus Government is not going to reject a fresh invitation by UN Secretary General Waldheim for talks in New York in order to promote the intercommunal negotiations. Specifically, we were informed that Foreign Minister Rolandhis is now inclined to proceed to New York for talks with Mr Waldheim on the stalemate in the intercommunal talks.

A spokesman for Mr Waldheim stated to I SIMERINI'S New York correspondent, Mr Mikhalis, Ignatiou, that the negotiations on the Famagusta question are not progressing and that the Turkish side is seeking serious exchanges for any agreement that would allow for the resettlement of Varosha. According to the same reports, the United Nations appears to some extent to have adopted the Turkish side's position that something important must be given in exchange for Famagusta. This question will be discussed in New York if Foreign Minister Rolandhis and Turkish Cypriot Atakol, who is currently in the capital of Saudi Arabia, finally proceed there.

However, according to our information, under no circumstances would the Greek side agree to the opening of the harbors in northern Cyprus or to the recognition of the Tymbou airfield. The only possibility to avert a failure of the talks would be the adoption of a compromise proposal for the operation of the Nicosia airport under a joint administration. However, it has not been learned how the two sides are reacting to this proposal. A UN spokesman told I SIMERINI that if this opportunity to settle the question of Famagusta is again lost, a considerable period of time will have to pass until fresh negotiations are again held.

KIPRIANOU DISCUSSES DEMOCRATIC PARTY POLICY

NC071848 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 7 Dec 80

[Text] The second Democratic Party [DIKO] district conference was held in Paphos today. In his address, Republic President and Party Chairman Kiprianou, among other things, said that DIKO's contribution to the government's effort to resolve the Cypriot issue could be of tremendous importance. DIKO, he added, would remain the forerunner in the effort to protect Cyprus from fresh destructive adventures and lead the struggle to restore the Cypriot people's rights. He also said that DIKO, as a party that covers the center and the democratic rightwing forums, prevented polarization and class struggles.

Referring to DIKO's political philosophy, Kiprianou said that the party believed in a developing democracy that would serve, at any given moment, all the classes according to their needs. DIKO, he added, wanted a balanced community that would rest upon a just distribution of the national income. Regarding the party's economic policy, Kiprianou said that DIKO supported private initiative but, at the same time, considered that the country should intervene when required by public interest.

DENKTAS SPEECH REAFFIRMS TURKISH CYPRIOT GOOD WILL

TA061249 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1215 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Text] President Denktas has reiterated that the struggle of the Turkish Cypriot community is for freedom and human dignity. Speaking at a dinner given by the Kyrenia Society last night, the president said that despite bitter experiences of the past, the Turkish Cypriot side had reaffirmed its good will and peaceful policy by agreeing to reestablish a republic in partnership with the Greek Cypriots. But, he stressed, the Greek Cypriot side was unwilling to accept such an agreement because it regarded itself as the legitimate government of the island.

Mr Denktas also said that in his talks with Mr Kliridhis in 1974, he had gathered the impression that the Greek Cypriot side had learned a lesson from the Turkish intervention which, itself, was the result of a coup on 15 July. But, he added that after the return of Archbishop Makarios there had been no favorable developments in the Cyprus situation until 1977 and that with the coming of Mr Kiprianou to power the situation had become worse. Finally Mr Denktas said: The final agreement should include guarantees by Turkey for the Turkish Cypriot community.

KHARAVYI: ENOSIS NO LONGER GREEK CYPRIOT GOAL

NC070905 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 7 Dec 80 p 3

[From the "Views and Comments" column: "Negative and Detrimental"]

[Text] In his recent speech Mr Denktas appeared to be negative. Although during the recent three rounds of talks a better atmosphere was created in connection with their development, Mr Denktas' speech the day before yesterday provides nothing creative and causes harm.

We are surprised by the fact that Mr Denktas cites as a basic reason for the absence of progress the so-called Greek Cypriot side's "insistence on enosis as the ultimate goal" and that Cyprus "is an extension of Greece." Reality is absolutely different. Enosis has definitely ceased to be the Greek Cypriot side's goal and it has been officially ruled out, as is the case with partition. The Turkish Cypriot leader is very well aware of this. As to why he is distorting reality, this is due to his negative stand and frame of mind. How does Mr Denktas overlook the fact that the four guidelines agreed upon between him and Makarios, and the Greek Cypriot proposals submitted in 1977, have absolutely nothing to do with the goal of enosis? Is the 19 May 1979 agreement not absolutely unrelated to enosis? Mr Denktas knows that no element in the Greek Cypriot proposals included in the four questions being discussed at the inter-Cypriot talks aims at enosis, and that what we are seeking--which enjoys the support of all the people--is a peaceful, fully independent Republic of Cyprus based on a biregional federation. The internal aspects--constitutional and so forth--must be settled through talks, and the 4 guidelines and the 10-point agreement which should serve as guiding compass.

Mr Denktas' negative attitude, which does not help the talks, has also been noted by at least three leading figures of the Turkish Cypriot opposition. Let Mr Denktas not cite as a pretext the "goal of enosis," which does not exist at all. It is his duty as well to positively contribute to the constructive development of the talks in order to arrive at a peaceful and fair solution which is much desired by the broad masses of both communities.

FOREIGN MINISTER REPORTS ON RELATIONS WITH EEC

AT061555 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 6 Dec 80 p 2

[Report on Foreign Minister Mitsotakis' television discussion with political correspondents in Athens on 5 December]

[Text] Europe's deepest concern over the progress of world economy, prospects available to Greece (as an EEC member) for coping with the international crisis, his optimism over the final outcome of the Greek-Turkish dialogue and good progress toeard a settlement of the question of U.S. bases in Greece, were all stressed yesterday by Foreign Minister Mitsotakis during a free television discussion with political correspondents.

Referring to the recent European summit conference at Luxembourg, Mitsotakis stressed that "the picture revealed by this conference was the picture of international economy." He immediately added that "the fact that today Greece finds itself within the Community helps and strengthens efforts to cope with these worldwide economic problems.

"If Greece were not within the Community," he added, "then repercussions would have been even more dramatic and perhaps we would have asked the Greek people for greater austerity."

Answering a question on whether the income policy of West European countries is more, or less, generous than that of Greece he stressed: "We have been more generous in face of the world crisis. We have even proceeded a bit further than we should have. In no case, however, does Greek economy have any more margin for additional grants. It is the duty of a responsible government to consider the resources available and then to satisfy the people within the limits provided by these resources."

"The Community," he added," will furnish us with the direction for better organizing our administration, our economy and our state as a whole." This answer was given by the foreign minister to a question related to his earlier statement that studies in Greece are of a low standard, that the labor potential is low and that competition within Greek business is nearly nonexistent. "The Greeks will be forced to work more because otherwise someone else will take his place."

Answering a question on whether the dark climate at the summit conference in Luxembourg could mean increased taxation for the Greeks, Mitsotakis warned:

"It is not possible to think that the government could retract any of its promises. If, however, we allow our economy to progress more along the course of additional grants, then there will be the danger that inflation cannot be controlled during the next year and the consequences will be disastrous. It is the poor who will pay for inflation while the rich benefit from inflation."

Concluding his conversation with political correspondents, the foreign minister also stressed, among other things:

On Greek foreign policy--by acceeding to the EEC we bring with us our foreign policy dowry. This is a policy which will be useful to the Community, to the Balkan countries and to the Middle East. We will enter a new stage of inter-Balkan cooperation with the meetings of the president of the republic in Yugoslavia. Our next meeting with the Bulgarians (in January) will be critical and in any case useful on the question of Nestos River waters.

On defense expenditure--both NATO and U.S. bases are related to the country's defense potential. Greece firmly and insistently demands that the balance of power between Greece and Turkey should be maintained because it is a factor for peace and security.

On the bases--bases in Greece will not operate outside the framework of NATO.

On relations with Turkey--there is optimism on the final outcome of negotiations with the Turks. The current Turkish leaders want dialogue. "I will not risk saying what the results will be or when we could reach some final result," he added.

Referring to aid supplied by the EEC to Turkey, Mitsotakis explained this is not within the framework of the EEC credit apparatus but within that of the West more generally. "They help Turkey to stay on its feet," he characteristically stated but since Turkey is not a member of the EEC we do not participate in this aid.

JOINT COMMITTEE MEETING CALLS FOR MORE U.S. TRADE

AT061455 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1230 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Text] Prospects of increased Greek-U.S. trade were the main subject dealt with at the first meeting of the Greek-U.S. committee on economic cooperation held at the Ministry of Coordination yesterday. The meeting was attended by 50 representatives from ministries and services from Greece and the United States and by representatives from Greek chambers and professional organizations.

A joint statement released today mentions that the meeting paid special attention to existing opportunities for expansion of Greek exports to the United States.

The U.S. delegation presented a preliminary analysis of opportunities for placing Greek products on U.S. markets and the Greek side expressed interest in more active U.S. business participation in large-scale Greek development projects. It explained advantages of investments in Greece and the incentives offered under Greek legislature.

More specifically, the Greek side explained a number of investment opportunities offered for foreign investments or for joint enterprises.

The two delegations reviewed the importance which Greek accession to the EEC has for Greek-U.S. trade and for economic Greek-U.S. relations. They also resolved to establish a working group seated in Athens which will examine proposals submitted during the meeting. This group will also organize visits by businessmen and industrial specialists.

I KATHIMERINI: NATO AIRSPACE PROPOSAL REJECTED

AT071700 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 7 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

During the 3-day negotiations, however, the Greek officers were presented with boundaries of Greek responsibility in Aegean airspace which were different to those which Greece has a right to claim, both on the basis of earlier agreements and of the Haig-Davos agreement which, supposedly, was taken as the basis for Greek reintegration in the military wing of NATO. The Greek delegation not only rejected the proposal but also refused to discuss any new meeting for consideration of the issue.

This development in internal NATO negotiations for solution of the well-known unresolved internal NATO issues--differences with Turkey--is also likely to influence progress of negotiations on U.S. bases in our country. This is because the Greek Government will not abandon its position that because the bases function within the framework of the Atlantic alliance it will continue to connect the two issues. Naturally, reintegration within the military wing of NATO led, as the Greek side had promised, to a start of negotiations for settlement of unresolved issues related to the Greek-U.S. agreement. The problems, however, which were to be solved after our reintegration, remained. Greece would not be prepared to demonstrate unilateral good will on an issue which is of such interest to it--the bases issue--if some internal NATO delay from the other side or even a repetition--and U.S. support--of well-known Turkish claims could possibly create a possibility of shrinkage of Greek or Greek controlled space.

Despite these intentions of the Greek Government, the Greek side completed preparation of the counterproposal it is ready to submit regarding most of its points. Portions of the counterproposal, which refer to the main draft agreement, the defense agreement, the legal status of the bases and their command and to the industrial cooperation agreement, have been completed. What remains are the "geographic appendices" which deal with the defense telecommunications system for the bases at Ellinikon, Souda, Nea Makri and Iraklion.

The preparation of these appendices is expected to be completed in time for the Greek Government to submit its counterproposal by 15 December. Submission of the Greek counterproposal to the U.S. side--particularly after the developments mentioned above--during the first basic Greek-NATO talks on operational control of airspace does not mean, as stressed by diplomatic observers, any progress in the Greek-U.S. agreement which might create the impression that the two issues are separate. The fact that there is a counterproposal on bases is indicative of the determination of the Greek Government which did not consider the U.S. proposals satisfactory to Greek interests.

At the same time, the signing of a defense and economic cooperation agreement with the United States before unresolved Greek issues at NATO take the road toward a solution is considered to be a weakening factor for the Greek negotiating position because with the base issue solved, even under excellent conditions, the Greek side would lose very important leverage in the confrontation of its positions, for example, on Aegean boundaries.

In reference to the Greek counterproposal, it is stressed that the U.S. side appears surprised because the draft agreement it submitted on the bases--which it also considered to be very good--was not accepted by the Greek Government.

Since, therefore, there appears to be conflict from the very first moment, it is natural that the Greek side should be "suspicious" of U.S. haste but without any bad intentions on the part of the Greek Government which very recently did underline that the speed of settlement of the bases issues will depend upon the degree of acceptance of Greek positions.

On the other hand, there is already a beginning of practical problems within the framework of NATO which are related to the remaining unresolved issues. It is also natural that these unresolved issues should influence the question of the bases, because they are related to fundamental issues the solution of which was taken into consideration at the time when the government connected the base and NATO issues.

What are these problems? Reintegration was formally instituted with Greece's resumed participation in the Defense Planning Committee. The basic aspects of reintegration, however, as for example the boundaries of headquarters under a Greek commander as well as other fundamental aspects of cooperation which, naturally, were not defined under the reintegration document ratified by the Chamber of Deputies, depend upon the solution of these unresolved issues. The solutions to be provided will also define Greek responsibilities within the framework of the alliance.

NATO hastily requested, and the basic talks started, on the boundaries of airspace as it is strictly provided for under the well-known text of the agreement, paragraph three, on our return to NATO: [following characters printed in English] (COMMSIXTAF (Smyrna) in consultation with COMMAIRSOUTH (commander in Naples)...), but there is no Greek (NATO) commander yet since the NATO Larisa headquarters has not yet been established. If, therefore, there is to be a Greek commander (to consult with), the boundaries of responsibility over Aegean airspace must first be defined.

At the same time, how could this commander take part in consultations without definition of the higher authority of his jurisdiction which will emerge through settlement of a series of questions affecting his headquarters, such as its mission, function, tactical operations, air defense, exchange of information and so forth. These are basic unresolved issues and their settlement may require months of negotiations, the first phase of which started in Naples for the definition of boundaries for the Turkish (NATO) commander.

A third issue which will perhaps influence both the progress and time of negotiations on the bases--in relation always with the NATO issue--appears to be U.S. unwillingness--at least at this phase--to guarantee benefits to the Greek side to the extent that they will guarantee: a) preservation of Aegean balance and b) the importance of their bases in our country; given the fact that although the bases serve NATO goals they also serve specific U.S. policy to a great extent over the extremely vital area of the Middle East. This U.S. determination for granting disproportional exchanges became evident with the first draft agreement it submitted which was considered unsatisfactory by the Greek Government.

On the basis of these facts, the Greek Government is at this moment undertaking--naturally always within its policy which is identical to that of liberal Western democratic countries--a protracted and very difficult negotiations struggle. It must be remembered that the Greek positions which will be submitted within the first 15 days of December are prepared not only on the basis of the agreement of '77 and of what is defined as defensive necessity on our part, but also--for reasons of balance--on the basis of the U.S.-Turkish agreement. This agreement--perhaps like our own agreement is for the Turks--is extremely unrevealing on such basic points as the amount of exchanges both in kind and in funds.

PRIME MINISTER ULUSU HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE

Internal Developments Cited

TA061135 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Excerpts] Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu said that the government is determined to eradicate the nests of terrorism, to ensure that persons having different political views are able to live side by side without killing each other and to enable the democratic order to function fully.

The prime minister held his first news conference in Ankara today. More than 100 local and foreign journalists, radio and TV personnel attended the conference. State Ministers and Deputy Prime Ministers Zeyyat Baykara and Turgut Ozal, State Minister Ilhan Oztrak, Finance Minister Kaya Erdem and the directors of certain establishments were also present.

In the first part of the news conference, Prime Minister Ulusu explained the work conducted since the operation carried out on 12 September to protect the republic. In the second part of the conference, he replied to questions.

The prime minister said that 48 bills submitted to the National Security Council since 12 September had been ratified and were in effect. He said that 14 of these laws were social bills, 9 dealt with security, 6 were tax laws and 19 were on various other issues. The prime minister also said that 40 bills had been approved by the Council of Ministers and submitted to the National Security Council.

On the government efforts to ensure peace and security, Ulusu noted that a great drop was registed in the anarchistic incidents since 12 September. He stressed that the serious struggle waged by the martial law and security forces was yielding results. He added: all the centers of anarchy and terror are bound to be eliminated in the face of the Turkish state's power.

On social security, Ulusu said that as a result of the measures taken by the government, civil servants would earn about 50 percent more and pensioners about 40 percent more in fiscal 1981 than in fiscal 1980.

The prime minister announced that the Council of Ministers had prepared a bill that would make it possible to conclude the collective labor agreements that had not been finalized by 12 September. He added that once the law went into effect, 450,000 workers would enjoy the conditions of collective labor agreements by the end of the year. The prime minister also noted that the members of the labor unions banned by martial law commands would be able to enjoy the same rights as well.

On the last part of his statement on government activities, Prime Minister Ulusu said: Our aim is to strengthen the democratic regime, which is based on human rights and freedoms, in such a way that the enemies of democracy cannot damage it again.

Prime Minister Ulusu then replied to reporters' questions. The details will be carried in later newsca

Economic, Foreign Policies

TA062011 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Excerpt] In a news confernece he held today in Ankara, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu noted that the government's economic policy is the development of economic stability. He said that the government attaches importance to pursuing and strengthening the economic stability program, ensuring that it is operated in accordance with the rules of market economy and that citizens are employed in a position of their choice. Ulusu said that the measures implemented prevent black market operations, unjust profits and earning money without working.

The prime minister noted that the main characteristics of the new tax system consist of simplifying taxes, achieving a just distribution of the tax burden, automatic readjusting in the face of inflation, adaptation of exemptions to existing conditions, using penalties as a deterrent and rendering the system of controls more effective. Pointing out that the government is determined to channel additional tax revenues into investments and thus contribute to growth and development, Ulusu noted that maximum attention was paid to this goal in the new budget.

Explaining his views on foreign policy, Ulusu said that relations with countries that are members of the Council of Europe and the EEC are being continued in a natural manner. Noting that the government welcomed the EEC decision during the days following the 12 September operation to continue its cooperation with Turkey, Ulusu said that the government attaches great importance to cooperation with the Council of Europe. Pointing out that NATO is very important for world peace, the prime minister said: We expect military and economic aid--which will contribute to Turkey's defense capability and economic development--to be accelerated and increased in a manner suitable to Turkey's special role within the alliance.

Referring to Turkish-Greek relations, Ulusu said the government is trying to establish relations based on the protection of mutual interests and the development of goodneighborliness and cooperation between the two countries.

He noted: We believe that, if Greece approaches the problems with the same good will as we do, there will be no reason for all the problems not to be solved within a balance of mutual interests.

Naturally, both countries should remember that they must refrain from actions that would shake confidence while negotiations are underway. Pointing out that the government wants to develop relations with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries based on mutual respect and interests, the prime minister also commented on the war between Iran and Iraq. He said: We are watching this war, which is causing great loss of life and material damage, with sorrow and concern. It is our sincere desire that this war be terminated as soon as possible and peaceful solutions found through negotiations to the problems between these two friendly and neighboring countries.

Noting that it is the government's goal to strengthen historical, cultural and moral ties with the Arab countries and to establish with them a fruitful cooperation serving mutual interests in every field, Ulusu also explained his views on relations with Israel. He said: As long as Israel does not engage in actions that threaten regional peace, does not injure the material and moral foundations of the other countries in the region through certain negative decisions, and measures and complies with the UN resolutions on the Middle East issue, there will be no obstacle to the continuation of our relations with that country in a normal manner.

HURRIYET COMMENTS ON RELATIONS WITH ISRAEL

NC051336 Istanbul HURRIYET in Turkish 3 Dec 80 p3

[Editorial by Oktay Eksi: "An Excellent Decision"]

[Excerpts] You must have seen it in the press: The Turkish Government has decided "to limit its diplomatic representation in Israel to the level of a second secretary." It has communicated this decision to the Israeli Government. It is also understood that the Turkish Government has asked the Israeli Government to "reduce its diplomatic representation in Turkey to the same level."

As a matter of fact, even if this suggestion had not been made, the Israeli Government could not be expected to act differently. Turkey was the first Muslim country to recognize Israel when it proclaimed its independence. But following the joint French, British and Israeli attack on Egypt, Turkey issued a statement on 29 November 1956 saying: "The Turkish Government has decided to recall its ambassador from Tel Aviv, not to return there again until the Palestinian issue has been finally resolved in a just manner." Ever since then, Turkey has been represented in Israel by a "charge d'affaires." Similarly, Israel had asked for its ambassador in Ankara to be considered as a charge d'affaires. This means that the Israeli representation in Ankara will in due course be reduced to the level of a second secretary.

In reality, the reason for this decision is not at all "complicated." This decision is taken because the Israeli Government has made it a habit of creating "faits accomplis" toward the entire world and of making it a principle to be intransigent in relations with other nations.

Israel has not refrained from creating new settlements on Arab territory and then proclaiming to the entire world "these lands belong to us." As if all this were not enough, on 24 July it proclaimed Jerusalem "the eternal and indivisible capital of Israel."

The Israeli Government completely ignored the reaction of the UN Security Council and the General Assembly to this decision. It has also ignored the "condemnation" resolutions and the call that "it should withdraw from all Arab territories including Jerusalem."

Meanwhile, the Turkish Government's condemnation of the Israeli Government's decision on Jerusalem and its subsequent decision to close down the Turkish Consulate General in Jerusalem went completely unheeded.

Now the decision taken by the Turkish Government constitutes a reaction to the insensitivity of the Israeli Government. It is also compatible with Turkey's desire to improve its relations with the other Islamic countries. Turkey must, however, be prepared to counter the propaganda which Israel will unleash against us.

GENSCHER CONCERNED BY EASTERN CRITICISM OF POLAND

[Text] Berlin, 8 Dec (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has expressed his concern over the "Eastern criticism of the development in Poland." Genscher used the occasion of the annual dinner of the Berlin Press Conference this evening to draw attention once again to the recent statement by the European Council on Poland and stressed "no one should disregard the great seriousness with which this statement was made." The West is ready to hold a dialogue with the Warsaw Pact states in the awareness that respect for the principles of the Helsinki Final Act is an indispensible prerequisite for such a dialogue.

The federal foreign minister added that the Federal Republic's readiness to take a share of responsibility within the international framework did (?not) mean "attempts by countries to go at it alone." German foreign policy remains embedded in the EEC and North Atlantic alliance. He warned against illusions that inter-German relationship could be "maintained as a sort of fairweather zone if East-West relations enter a bad weather zone." On the other hand, setbacks in inter-German relations would not be accepted and "isolationism" would be countered with the "will for cooperation." Everything would be done to prevent inter-German relations leading to additional disturbances in overall East-West relations.

As part of an active peace policy, Genscher called for a "quantitative and qualitative expansion of confidence-building measures." This must be made a "dynamic element of European arms control policy." The regional sphere of the measures to be developed must cover all of Europe. Genscher called on the East to recognize that in discussion on international security "the establishment of a parity of predictability" was also important.

Interview on Poland, FDP Policy

DW081202 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 1810 GMT 7 Dec 80

[Hans-Joachim Reiche and Horst Keller interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Bonn; date not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Genscher, before we proceed to foreign affairs and viewing what concerns us so much, namely, the developments in Poland, let us discuss the party chairman, the vice chancellor: As far as the coalition is concerned the FDP does not intend to add any extras. But this perhaps is exactly what your coalition partner intends to do, or is bound to pursue, because the SPD base wants to because the trade unions back it. Will this turn into a situation where the working foundation of the coalition will be touched or even disturbed?

[Answer] As far as we are concerned, the result of the coalition negotiations is a balanced one and the same applies to the leadership of the Social Democrats; otherwise the outcome would not have been attained. Both parties now are bound to be interested in converting into policies what they have planned to do. This is the criterion by which the government will be judged and not the criticism. I am positive that the Social Democrats, too, will strictly abide by what they have agreed. All this must be put aside if you view what the two government parties say about all the political concepts they would implement if it were up to them alone to make the decision. We are doing that, the party congress has done it, and so have the Social Democrats. I do not even regret it. I believe that the election result in our favor was essentially influenced by the realization of many citizens that this is the liberal policy and by their awareness of what kind of policy would be practiced if the Social Democrats could govern alone.

[Question] Mr Genscher, doesn't this make it necessary to approach the question from an entirely different angle? You are, the latest opinion polls say, on an upward trend among the people. But to go by the results of the same polls constantly more voters, potential voters, advocate the view that this coalition policy pursued to date should not be continued. Won't you have to set new emphases after all?

[Answer] The voters quite essentially elected us because of the objective policy we advocate, and surely also because of those who represent the party in the different offices; nothing will change in that. In addressing the party convention I said quite clearly that we have been elected as a whole, including both program and personnel, and we intend to abide by just that.

[Question] At the party congress, Mr Genscher, you hinted that the vast election success scored by the FDP on 5 October seems to be a chance for you to develop toward a people's party. But your relationship with the trade unions is not good. There are not only disputes with the trade unions but nearly conflicts. Is it possible for a party to become a people's party without having the trade unions on its side, or at least without having them against oneself?

[Answer] I think it should not be the objective of a party to have the trade unions on its side in such a way that this party is supported by the trade unions alone. It is important that the democratic parties on the one hand and the trade unions on the other remain on decent talking terms. This is what we are trying to achieve. But what must not happen is that election results are changed, say, by the trade unions' demand that a party depart from fundamental positions. What is required is mutual respect and an objective dialogue. This is what we pursue. But we are not taking any orders, either from the trade unions or from the employers associations or the churches. We are an independent party, and there is not the least doubt in my mind that the good showing of the Free Democrats is not least attributable to the appreciation of this very internal and external independence of the FDP by many citizens in our country, and to their desire to strengthen that independence.

[Question] Is the people's party the objective?

[Answer] The FDP must be open to all strata of our people, and those involved in the respective cases will be critical citizens, citizens who appreciate performance, and above all citizens who want liberality and who do not wish to be crowded by organizational power from any side, citizens to whom freedom, specifically the freedom of the individual, constitutes the decisive criterion for judging all political interrelations and developments.

[Question] At this party congress the anticipated clash between the Young Democrats and the newly founded Young Liberals did not take place, that is, the clash between the left-wing liberal and the conservative segments of your youth organization. You said yourself that there would not be any war by proxy. But proxy for whom? Are there any struggles between wings in your party, or are any wings becoming more prominent in the party?

[Answer] As I said, the party has been elected as a whole, with respect to its plurality as well which veritably is a foregone conclusion for a liberal party. What is decisive, however, is that this party is determined to make policies on the basis of the program we have, wherefore there are no wing struggles but rather very lively debates on the further development of our program.

[Question] Hence, something of a positive nature?

[Answer] Decidedly positive.

[Question] But, Mr Genscher, does the dispute or debate within the two government parties and also between them not abet the development of a grand coalition between the SPD and the CDU? Hasn't this created nearly a current in that direction?

[Answer] I would not want to speak of a debate between the two government parties, although I do want to say that it has again become plain to the voter that what he sees here is two independent parties supporting a government and not any run-of-the-mill political pulp. I will tell you, on the other hand, that I do not consider disadvantageous any objectivization of the relationship between the Social Democrats and the Christian Democrats. In all the time I have been a member of the government, either as minister of the interior or as minister of foreign affairs, I have sought to achieve an objective relationship with the CDU/CSU. This was misinterpreted sometimes. I am gratified at seeing now that others find that it is better for our democracy not to face each other like hostile troops and not to have the country divided into two parts by any trenches, but to endeavor for an objective dialogue also between the government parties and the opposition. We are living in a federalist state in which the opposition parties have the majority in the Bundesrat, and the Bundesrat must cooperate in the adoption of laws. I tell you that I would be happy if a relationship of objective talks would emerge now after the very hostile debates between the SPD and the CDU with many invocations of the arbitration authority. By this these two parties would merely followup on what has been existing between us and the opposition for quite some time.

[Question] Let us now proceed to the foreign minister. The news from Poland is unchanged, being very serious and causing concern. You said in Luxembourg several times that detente policy would not bear another Afghanistan. Suppose such a situation of tension continues to exist and decisions have to be made, how will Europe react, with one voice as an entity? Or will the individual states of Europe then handle their own reactions?

[Answer] The meeting of the heads of state and government and of the foreign ministers in Luxembourg has shown that this difficult problem, too, is being assessed uniformly and in full accord. I believe it is worthwhile in this context to read the communique which the leaderships of the Warsaw Pact states issued in Moscow at their meeting. It expresses interest in the dialogue with the West, and especially also the interest in the dialogue with the new U.S. president--and this needs to be particularly emphasized. And I really suppose that those having published such a communique are aware that it is a precondition for this dialogue that the principles, the commitments all of us undertook in Helsinki, all the signatory states undertook in Helsinki, be observed by all sides as well. It is just as worthwhile in this context to recall the German-French statement of February 1980 at the German-French meeting in Paris, which says in part that detente would not endure another blow of this kind. I think everybody is aware of the consequences that would result from a violation of the principles of the Helsinki Final Act.

[Question] It is clear that the Americans expect strong European reactions in this matter. We have always expected considerateness from the Americans because of our special situation: a divided country, Berlin. Has it been clarified how much leeway we would have in such a case?

[Answer] One must not speculate on the future, considering what would happen if something were this or that. One must analyze the current situation to make future decisions on the basis of general interests. And in this respect everybody must know that inter-German relations are imbedded in the general East-West relationship. It would be an illusion to assume that an island of the happy could be preserved if East-West relations deteriorated.

We are not interested in other tensions reflecting on inter-German relations. We must see to it that no handicaps will emanate from inter-German relations, impairing East-West relations, but pursuing inter-German relations in an isolated way would be an illusion that could create problems.

What does that mean with regard to German policy? German policy must see to it together with the allies that East-West relations will develop positively by themselves. [illegible] themselves means that one is not independent in this respect and that the others must cooperate.

The decisive matter in every political decision of the Federal Republic of Germany is the fact that we are a part of the West. We can take care of our national interests only in cooperation with our allies, with the partners of the European Community, with the United States of America. There is no such thing as playing a special German role, unless one wants to sacrifice our national interests.

[Question] Mr Stobbe, the mayor of Berlin, has just pointed out that the structure of our treaties with the East would fall apart, that detente would have clearly come to an end if the Soviets intervened. Is that also your conclusion?

[Answer] I have quoted in an earlier answer the German-French statement of February 1980, saying that detente would be unable to stand a second blow of this kind.

[Question] Mr Minister, we all hope that the Polish situation will become stabilized again and calm down. And yet how can one continue to pursue a policy toward the East with such recurring handicaps? Will your policy toward the East be reduced to trade policy?

[Answer] We indeed hope that the Polish people will solve their problems under their own responsibility. Nobody must interfere there. A form of help in the economic field exists to solve these problems. It is important that not just we will be determined to give that help, but also our partners in the European Community as well as the United States. If we could contribute in such a way to a stabilization of the situation in Poland, I believe we should do it. It is even a commitment to do it.

As regards East-West relations, however, there are great problems. There is the disarmament problem, there is the action of the states participating in the East-West process in other parts of the world, there are important issues to be repeatedly discussed in the interest of security in the world. If this is what Moscow with its statement--one must be aware there, I repeat, that a constructive dialogue presupposes constructive action everywhere in the world, in Europe and outside it, constructive action also by the other side--if Moscow views these matters in such a way, one can assume that we, the West, will be an open-minded and constructive discussion partner.

[Question] No alternative exists with regard to detente. That was the guideline for a long time. Afghanistan must not recur, but who will guarantee this? In view of this handicap we must ask ourselves whether we have to develop another policy some day.

[Answer] The correct version is no reasonable alternative, and indeed it cannot be reasonable to replace cooperation with confrontation. One must therefore try to achieve a constructive dialogue, as far as this can be achieved by us. I believe that it is realized very well in the capitals of the Warsaw Pact that cooperation is also of an elementary interest for the East. I have always maintained that cooperation is not a gift to the other side, but that cooperation means that both sides can take care of their interests.

[Question] The Americans will say clearly and concretely at the NATO conference next week what they expect us to do. Will the Europeans give an equally concrete answer?

[Answer] The alliance is an alliance of American democracies, of North American democracies, and of Europeans. The contradiction contained in your question is not in line with the character of the alliance, because this alliance serves the security of all the involved states. The United States also defends its security here in Europe. I hope and wish--it is our aim--that a determination of Western democracies will emanate from this meeting aimed at preserving the common security. On the basis of the common security we will contribute through our own defense contributions to a solution of this world's problems.

NATO must more strongly than in the past articulate its common political ideas, because NATO--due to its existence--is a factor of security in the world and in Europe. The peace we have enjoyed in this country for several decades would have been impossible as peace in freedom and independence without our membership in the Western alliance, without our alliance with the United States of America. Nobody in our country must forget that. Those forgetting it would be calling in question the principles of the Germans' freedom and independence.

[Question] You do not fear that a crisis could develop in the alliance because of American expectations and European promises?

[Answer] No.

[Question] Mr Minister, the world expects much from us in the years to come: Our alliance partners, the European Community--which will develop to consist of 12 members, thus creating new problems--and the Third World. We are in a situation, however, where the growth rate is zero. The foreign trade balance is negative. Are we in a position to live up to these expectations, or will we have to disappoint the world?

[Answer] We will not disappoint it. We and others will have to realize that foreign policy is more than something one can buy for money, it is constructive cooperation, the realization of common interests.

The world situation has become more difficult. The dangers are great. I must tell you quite frankly that I consider it a great gain in this difficult situation that the foreign policy of this country finds more and more support in the German Bundestag, a policy that has been developed vis-a-vis the United States, Europe, the East and the Third World.

The discussion on the government statement demonstrated that the opposition adopted a supportive approach to basic foreign policy issues. It indicates that the Federal Government can expect to be supported by the opposition as in the past on such important issues as disarmament policy. That is a great gain for German foreign policy. It makes me hope that we will be able to pass the great tests we are facing, pass them on the safeguarding basis of our country's wide support of our foreign policy.

LEADERS GREET POLAND ON TREATY ANNIVERSARY

[Text] Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA)--Federal President Karl Carstens is convinced that cooperation based on mutual trust between the Federal Republic and the People's Republic of Poland offers a good basis for dealing with future tasks. Carstens expressed this view today in a greetings message to Chairman of the Polish State Council Henryk Jablonski marking the 10th anniversary of the Warsaw Treaty.

Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stressed in his message to party leader Stanislaw Kania and Chairman of the Council of Ministers Jozef Pinkowski the great achievements that have been made in the development of German-Polish relations. The Warsaw Treaty will continue in the future to prove a sound basis for the continued development of cooperation between the two states. The Federal Government is prepared to continue along this road.

In his message to Polish Foreign Minister Jozef Czyrek, Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher drew attention to the fact that the dialogue--marked by increasing trust--between the leading figures of the two countries has made an important contribution to the development of relations. This dialogue is also necessary for the continuation of the process of detente and the peaceful balancing of interests in Europe and the world.

SITUATIONS IN AFGHANISTAN, KAMPUCHEA UNACCEPTABLE

[Text] Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Republic is still not prepared to accept the present situations in Afghanistan and Kampuchea which are results of the use of force in contradiction to international law. This was stressed by Hildegard Hamm-Bruecher, minister of state at the Foreign Ministry, at a reception given today in Bonn for the heads of diplomatic missions from the Asia-Pacific region. In both these conflicts Bonn is striving for a solution which takes into consideration the interests of all the neighbors of the above-mentioned unfortunate nations.

Hamm-Bruecher said that Bonn's policy aims at an Afghanistan which would resume its former goodneighborly relations with the Soviet Union out of the free will of the population and in accordance with the traditional ties between the two countries. The aim of the Federal Government's policy on Indochina is a sovereign Kampuchea which shapes its internal affairs itself, free of any foreign domination. The minister of state expressed a desire to reestablish the "positive balance of forces" which have enabled the Asian states to develop their economic, social and cultural forces to the advantage of their nations without external interference or threat from others. This is an indispensible condition for peaceful development.

BOELLING 'INDIRECTLY WARNS' GDR on TRAVEL LIMITS

[Excerpt] Bonn, 8 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Government indirectly warned the GDR today against restricting travel opportunities for pensioners to the Federal Republic. Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling again said the government knew nothing that could give cause to describe reports of East Berlin plans for such restriction as anything other than "without foundation." He said that Bonn did not want to talkanything into existence and that there is no reason for doing so. Boelling said the GDR would be "very ill-advised" to stop pensioners from making visits necessitated by urgent family circumstances. He also stressed the Federal Republic's "very keen interest" that such contacts between families not be reduced. He reaffirmed Bonn's basic intention of not reacting to East Berlin's policy of reduction in contacts with a similar policy, and of continuing cooperation with the GDR taking into consideration the "overall context" of relations.

DEUTSCHE WELLE EXPANDS PROGRAM DUE TO USSR JAMMING

[Commentary signed ME.: "Useful Jamming Stations"]

[Text] The Soviet Union is being properly exposed at the Madrid CSCE followup conference for its interference in the airwaves with jamming stations, which since August are supposed to handicap or make impossible the reception of Western radio broadcasts. That is correct and necessary, but it is equally correct that these jamming stations have rendered a useful service to Deutsche Welle in Cologne: by pointing out that reception had deteriorated, the station was able to extend and intensify its Russian-language broadcasts on new shortwave frequencies. Instead of 160 minutes it is now broadcasting 195 minutes daily. Maybe a new broadcasting plan will entail further extension of the Russian programs. Since the number of jamming stations cannot be increased indefinitely, and since the tense world situation makes attentive listening to information worthwhile, the setting up of jamming stations could turn out to be a mistake. Deutsche Welle in Cologne and its listeners in the Soviet Union are trying harder. Ukrainian programs ought to be added soon to the Russian broadcasts.

OFFICIALS, JAPAN'S ITO DISCUSS POLAND, TRADE

Meeting With Barre

OW090048 Tokyo KYODO in English 0026 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] Paris, 8 Dec (KYODO)--French Premier Raymond Barre told Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito Monday that East-West detente will collapse if the Soviet Union should intervene in Poland. Barre said the West must take due steps should such a situation occur. He said he hoped to consult fully with Japan if measures are to be taken against the Soviet Union. Ito replied that Japan also wanted to hold consultations with Europe and take necessary measures.

Ito, who is visiting Paris on the first leg of his five-nation European tour, met with the French premier for more than an hour Monday afternoon and exchanged views on the situation in Poland and Japan-Europe trade issues.

On trade friction between Japan and Europe resulting from surging Japanese exports of cars and color TV sets, Ito said he wanted to deal with the matter as an economic issue before it develops into a political problem.

Barre feared that the problem will develop into a political issue if no solution was reached at an early date. He also said although the free trade principle should be maintained, it is necessary to conduct exports in an orderly manner.

He said settlement should be reached under the broad formula of increasing exports to Japan and through industrial cooperation between Japan and France and Japan and Europe.

Ito said there is a limit to what the government can do because trade is being undertaken by enterprises. He said he hoped to study what sort of cooperation can be made by Japan after hearing the views of various European countries and the European Community Commission.

Ito also referred to the Afghanistan issue and said there are views within Japan that the economic sanctions taken against the Soviet Union by Japan were too severe. He thus indicated there was need for Japan, the United States and European countries to make readjustment in order to work together on sanctions against the Soviet Union.

Talks With Stirn

OW090017 Tokyo KYODO in English 0005 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] Paris, 8 Dec (KYODO)--Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito met with Olivier Stirn, French junior state minister in charge of foreign affairs, Monday and agreed that Japan and Europe should cooperate so that a situation in which the Soviet Union will intervene in Poland will not occur.

Ito, who is in Paris to attend the ministerial meeting of the International Energy Agency (IEA), exchanged views with Stirn on international and bilateral economic problems for some two hours.

On the situation in Poland, they agreed that military intervention in that country by the Soviet Union will pose a more serious threat to detente than at the time of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Therefore, they agreed that such a situation should be prevented through Japan-Europe cooperation.

Stirn told Ito that it is not known at the present moment whether the Soviet Union will intervene in Poland. He said that results obtained in improving East-West relations up to now will be lost, however, depending on the future situation in Poland.

Ito said that the problem in Poland should be solved by the Polish people themselves without outside interference and agreed with Stirn's view that Japan and Europe should cooperate to prevent Soviet intervention.

Ito also referred to the Kampuchea problem and said Japan supports moves of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) to hold an international conference to find a solution. Stirn expressed support for Japan's stand.

Ito and Stirn also agreed on the need to prevent spread of the Iran-Iraq conflict and Soviet advance into the warring area. They also agreed that peace in the Middle East should be reached through recognition of the right of survival of both Israel and Palestine.

On economic problems, Stirn noted that economic issues exist between Japan and France and expressed the hope that Japan, which has become an economic power, will play a suitable role for their solution as a member of the Western countries. Ito replied that it is necessary to maintain free trade and Japan wants to continue a dialogue to seek a solution for this purpose.

The two agreed that cooperation between Japan and France was necessary so that the economic problems will not develop into political issues.

GISCARD CITED ON ECONOMIC PROSPECTS, EC ISSUES

LD081249 Paris LE MONDE in French 4 Dec 80 p 38

[Philippe Lemaitre report: "French Economy Must Achieve Even Better Performances Than Those Planned by European Commission, Giscard D'Estaing Says in Luxembourg"]

[Text] Luxembourg (European Communities)—The French economy must aim at a 2.2 percent growth and reduce its rate of inflation by more than 2 points; in other words it must achieve performances which are considerably better than those planned by the Brussels Commission. That is what Giscard d'Estaing told the press Tuesday, 2 December, when he left the European Council meeting in Luxembourg.

"I think that, in the coming months, bringing down inflation must constitute the main axis of French economic policy," the president of the republic said. "It is a matter of national urgency to reduce this high rate of price increases which is affecting our overseas competitiveness. However, we will not attempt to attain this objective by following a deflationary policy."

The Commission is reckoning on a very low average growth in the Community in 1980: 0.6 percent. However, it forecasts that the rate will be 1.2 percent in France. According to Brussels, average inflation in the EEC will be reduced from 12 percent in 1980 to 9.7 percent in 1981; for France there will be a drop of 2 points. Giscard d'Estaing said he thinks that the target he is setting for the French economy (higher growth, bigger drop in inflation than Brussels forecasts) is not "unusually difficult." "France," he pointed out, "is now experiencing a more rapid rate of price increases than most of its European neighbors, while economic growth is nonetheless low. That means there are anomalies which can be put right." The president did not give any indications about the economic policy he envisages for curbing the crisis.

The government chiefs' exchange of views on the situation did not add anything very new. The Nine consider that the repeated oil price increases "are the main cause of the world recession." "Any new oil price increase," they warn, "would have disastrous consequences."

The draft document drawn up by senior officials states: "The European Council believes that the prospects for the European economy have never been gloomier." The heads of government, probably anxious not to alarm people, played down this passage. "The European Council believes that the prospects for the European economy have never called for greater vigilance," the final version reads.

The Council also remarks that the European Monetary System "set up 2 years ago has worked in an exemplary fashion." However, the move to the second stage involving the setting up of a European monetary fund with powerful resources--which was initially planned for April 1981--has been put off until better times. Meanwhile the Council advocated a "gradual increase in the use of the European currency unit." "We hope that the European currency unit will increasingly emerge as a monetary tool in its own right and that it might, for instance, be used in borrowing transactions," Giscard d'Estaing commented. The government chiefs did not discuss the question of trade relations between the Community and Japan. They merely referred to the statement on this subject adopted by the nine foreign ministers 25 November.

Giscard d'Estaing confirmed that Francois-Xavier Ortoli, vice chairman for economic and financial questions, and Claude Cheysson, who is in charge of cooperation and development aid, would continue to be the two French members of the Commission. "They have been responsible for two important portfolios in a difficult period. There are actions in progress which will benefit from some continuity," the president commented.

FRANCOIS-PONCET OUTLINES POLICY ON CSCE, POLAND

[Text] In the speech which he delivered to the Senate on the morning of Friday, 5 December, during the examination of his budget, Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet recalled the main lines of French policy, stating in particular: "France decided to keep the appointment in Madrid. Why? Because, despite its imperfections and its ups and downs, the process which was started at Helsinki reflects a reality and expresses a desire: the reality of a Europe which, despite the borders which divide it, forms in its diversity one single zone of culture and civilization; the desire to gradually give back to this common European consciousness the means of expressing itself while respecting national sovereignties and ideological choices--because it has enabled tens of thousands of Jews and Germans to emigrate to the country of their choice; because it has given thousands of others the chance of traveling outside their borders; because it has made it possible to settle many humanitarian cases."

With regard to Poland the minister said in particular: "It is up to the Poles and they alone to carry out the task they have started. As the European Council has just stated, any other attitude would have extremely grave consequences for the future of international relations in Europe and in the world." Two terms sum up France's attitude to Poland, Mr Francois-Poncet stressed: "sympathy," in particular for the effort to achieve "greater democratic participation" which is being shown "through the present movements"; and "readiness" to respond to the "requests for economic aid which have been made to France."

LE MONDE CITES OPINION POLL ON PRESIDENTIAL RACE

[Text] On Tuesday, 2 December, LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS published an opinion poll carried out by Indice-Opinion, according to which Michel Colucci, known as Coluche, would receive 10 to 12.5 percent of the votes if the presidential election took place today. In the first round Giscard d'Estaing would come out ahead of Francois Mitterrand and Georges Marchais. In the second round he would obtain 58 percent of the votes as against 42 percent for Mitterrand.

FREITAS DO AMARAL ANNOUNCES GOVERNMENT RESIGNATION

[Excerpts] The Council of Ministers, chaired by Deputy Prime Minister Freitas do Amaral, has been meeting this evening.

At the end of the meeting, Prof Freitas do Amaral read a communique from the Council:

[Begin do Amaral recording] The prime minister's death makes it now necessary for the government to resign. The government did not submit its resignation immediately to avoid disturbing the electoral process then under way. Now that this process is over, the government must follow the procedure laid down in the constitution and in accordance with democratic principles.

In the circumstances, the Council of Ministers has decided to charge the deputy prime minister with the task of conveying the government's resignation to the president of the republic.

In terms of the constitution, the government will remain in a caretaker capacity until the president of the republic names a prime minister. [end recording]

Addressing journalists at the end of the Council of Ministers' meeting, the acting prime minister said that the naming of the new prime minister should originate from an indication by the Social Democratic Party, adding that nomination of the head of the next government should constitute a solution concerted within the Democratic Alliance.

Referring to the statements by President of the Republic Ramalho Eanes at his news conference for the state news media, Freitas do Amaral stressed that the government would not tolerate any intervention by the president of the republic in the sphere of its powers. The acting prime minister said that the government had reaffirmed its confidence in those in charge of Portuguese radio and television.

This point of friction between the government and the president of the republic, Freitas do Amaral said, does not augur well at all for the relations between the two organs of sovereignty.

EANES GIVES POSTVICTORY PRESS CONFERENCE

[News conference given by newly reelected Portuguese President Ramalho Eanes to Portuguese and foreign journalists on 8 December at the Gulbenkian Foundation in Lisbon in the presence of Maria de Lourdes Pintasilgo, appointed interim prime minister by Eanes prior to the election of 2 December 1972; Sousa Franco, leader of the Independent Social Democratic Association; Madeiros Ferreira, leading member of the reformist group and Antonio Arnaut of the Socialist Party--live]

[Excerpts] [Eanes] Good evening, gentlemen. Before placing myself at your disposal to reply to your questions, I would like very briefly to say the following:

My victory--a political victory, of course--my reelection is the victory of democracy. This is not an original statement; it is a statement made repeatedly throughout the election campaign, as you know.

I believe that this statement of mine has acquired a new dimension, a new quality, because the Portuguese people, as indeed I always expected, have given proof of their capacity for impartially assessing the facts and values of our national political life. They gave proof of this in spite of the fact that--as certainly all of you gentlemen, alert observers that you are, must have noticed, especially in the last few months--the democratic pluralism that must be demanded in a democracy has not been ensured, I repeat has not been ensured, not even for appearances' sake.

In the context of these elections, for example, there were newspapers published on Saturday adn even on Sunday--I shall not name names because I am not here to make accusations--which were flagrantly in violation of legal principles and democratic ethics; indeed, I would say in breach of civic morality.

I hope that this victory may also serve to prove that attempts at manipulation are doomed to failure and that earnestness and honesty, tolerance and democratic solidarity, will always prove much stronger than the deliberate distortions and attempts to manipulate public opinion, a public opinion that must inarguably be respected by anyone with a Christian outlook--an outlook which ought to be shared by all inhabitants of this country regardless of party affiliation or position in the ideological spectrum.

This is an area of our democratic life where methods and habits must certainly change so that everyone's chance of expressing and informing themselves freely, and above all truthfully, may be safeguarded.

I repeat that this victory of mine is, in my opinion--and, I believe, in everyone's opinion--the victory of democracy. It is therefore also very clearly the victory of all those members of parties which identify themselves with social democracy and democratic socialism as well as independent figures who are true democrats who gave me their support, effort, dedication and confidence.

I think that this is what democracy is all about. It is all about serious and responsible work by people who do not refrain from criticizing when criticism is called for but who are also capable of strengthening the manifestations of confidence when the common goal is the defense of democracy, the defense of the future.

I wish to convey my gratitude to all those men and women and to pledge my fidelity to the ideals that I have always upheld and that throughout this campaign I have repeatedly had the opportunity to formulate.

In relation to the problems of the immediate future I would like very briefly to state the following:

With regard to the so-called government crisis, I shall allow all the time required for the parliamentary majority to find a viable and balanced solution in the framework of all the parties that it comprises. I shall be permanently available for helping to create the consensus required for carrying out the constitutional revision which can now take place in a democratic context free from the threat of ruptures, free from the threat of seeing the country divided into two more or less equal halves that might find themselves at loggerheads with each other.

I think that I am in a position to state that conditions now exist--conditions that I shall seek to enhance--for attaining a national consensus, especially on the major issues confronting all Portuguese, confronting democracy, confronting Portugal. These, as you know, are the problems pertaining to the international economic crisis, to the current international political crises, and also the problems related to internal issues. These issues demand first, the mobilization of all Portuguese so as to tackle the tasks which the issues impose; second, the mobilization of all Portuguese so as to preserve social stability; and third, an ever-present concern for and awareness of the need to see that the dignity and rights of all--I repeat all--Portuguese may be always and in all circumstances respected.

This it what I had to say to you and now I am at your disposal for any questions you may wish to put to me.

[Excerpts] [Question by unidentified Portuguese reporter] Mr President, I have one question dealing with the recent past and one concerning the future. The first is whether you could briefly tell us to what you attribute this victory. Do you attribute it to the voters' realization that you had fulfilled the program you had set yourself for your previous mandate? The question on the future is the following: Will you, Mr President, authorize the installation of nuclear weapons in Portugal or will you allow Portugal to provide base facilities for nuclear aircraft carriers?

[Answer] With regard to the past, I believe that the result of these elections does in effect clearly reflect the fact that the Portuguese are capable, in spite of everything and against all manner of odds, of discerning political facts and analyzing them; that they are capable of critically assessing, and therefore judging, political personalities and that they are capable, on the basis of all this, of making up their minds.

I think that this shows that the Portuguese are a politically mature people and are definitely committed to democracy. It also shows--and this is a responsibility that will weigh on my shoulders--that they trust my capacity, in every circumstance, to defend the values that I regard as essential and that are closely associated with the concept of democracy. That is to say, the values of freedom, justice, social fraternity and also national identify; the latter viewed in its various manifestations, particularly culture and sovereignty.

With regard to the future, Portugal has a certain position in the world, especially from a strategic standpoint, and will fully respect the undertakings arising from its international committments, namely vis-a-vis NATO. At the outset there would not appear to be any interest in setting up nuclear missile bases in Portugal, nor do I think there is any interest in establishing, in Portugal, naval units carrying nuclear weapons.

At any rate, I believe that these matters are matters of state. They must be viewed in a broad context and must basically take into account the interest of the country, the interests of the GEO strategic bloc to which it belongs, and al , obviously, the wishes of the Portuguese people which, in matters of this nature, must be clearly and properly defined and expressed and which, necessarily must be democratically accepted.

[Question] My name is Joaquim Furtado, from Informacao-2 [Portuguese television channel]. I would like to ask the following: The presidential majority which has just reelected you, General, is substantially different, from an ideological standpoint, from the presidential majority which elected you in 1976. To what extent will you take this into account?

[Answer] Throughout my first mandate I have always rejected the presidential majorities. I see them as something of a contrivance to be politically exploited in various circumstances. I have in the past never consented to be the leader of any presidential majority and shall not agree to be the leader of any presidential majority in the coming mandate.

I take the view--and have stated it repeatedly--that the president of the republic, by virtue of the constitution's stipulations and the Portuguese people's understanding of the president of the republic's role, is the president of all Portuguese and not the president of a given majority. I shall do my utmost in this mandate to really be the president of all Portuguese and therefore will concern myself with seeking to consider and tackle all problems in a climate of institutional solidarity and from a national standpoint.

[Question] Mr President, I represent Mexican television. Has the death of General [as heard] Sa Carneiro in any way influenced the vote?

[Answer] I beg your pardon?

[Question] Has the death of General [as heard] Francisco Sa Carneiro in any way influenced the presidential elections, whether in a positive or a negative way? Another question: When shall we know the name of the next prime minister, since at the moment there is only one in an acting capacity?

[Answer] I think that the death of Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro--for which I have already had the opportunity of expressing my regret--was felt by the Portuguese in a worthy manner, a manner which, I would add, was unfortunately not fully respected by some people, but it had no influence on the election results.

The Portuguese are a mature people. They know how to differentiate situations. They paid tribute to the statesman killed in tragic circumstances and then, overriding their understandable emotions, they proceeded to give their answer to a political problem that concerned their present and future.

With regard to the future prime minister, there exists a political procedure which will not be changed. The accepted norm is to accept the name or names proposed to the president of the republic by the parliamentary majority or the majority party and the same thing will be done this time.

I shall accept the name proposed by the parliamentary majority or, if several are put forward, I shall chose one.

[Question] [Name indistinct] of newspaper COMERCIO DO PORTO, [words indistinct] and also taking into account the forthcoming revision of the constitution.

[Answer] The Socialist Party and the Social Democratic Party are democratic parties and I believe that they have the capacity and the potential ability to resolve their problems to the satisfaction of their rank and file and of the country at large. I am fully convinced that this will be the case. [words indistinct] The fact is, when the political parties are well-organized and democratic they can always find solutions through their internal machinery and thus attain stability.

With regard to constitutional revision, I believe that conditions have been created for carrying it out and doing so without strife. I believe that by now all Portuguese party leaders have come to the realization that constitutional revision is indispensable, that the constitution must be adjusted to the present new situation, but that this adjustment must be accomplished through democratic negotiation, democratic compromise, so that a solution may be achieved which will suit all political parties and basically suit the Portuguese people and their interest.

[Question] My name is Jose Pedro Castanheira from the weekly O JORNAL. Mr President, as a candidate you and your campaign officials were critical, at times fiercely so, of RDP [radio station] and RTP [Portuguese television] for lack of independence and lack of pluralism in their approach. I would like to ask: What type of action do you propose to take, in the context of the powers at your disposal, to reestablish the criteria of independence, pluralism and objectivity in radio and television?

[Answer] I propose to reply to your question in two parts, which will of course supplement one another.

Without an enlightened public opinion there can be no democracy, and public opinion becomes enlightened through capable mass media. The mass media should be objective and critical--but critical of all that is wrong in society. The media should never be an instrument for the use of those in power. This would be democratically improper and is justified only in totalitarian societies. There is every interest in the mass media playing their proper role, especially in a country that wants to build democracy. A journalist cannot be a propagandist. A journalist is a man with an important role to play in our society; he must not permit the alienation of that role. Obviously, as I have pointed out, you cannot ask the journalist to be a daily hero. You cannot expect him, faced by the threat of dismissal, consistently to adopt principled, crusading stands every day of his life. I know this is so.

In short, therefore, conditions must be created to enable a journalist to be competent, honest and above all straightforward--to be capable of distancing himself from those in power, of being independent from them, and of criticizing them--but criticizing objectively, and to criticize objectively means to criticize constructively, without resorting to slander and lies, without resorting to propaganda. A newspaper that lends itself to such practices truly loses the public's respect; indeed it loses the democratic right to be called a newspaper.

Clearly the situation in the mass media has concerned me of late, and it has concerned me for reasons that are obvious and that I need not go into.

As to the second part of my reply, I would say that I shall do everything within my power--I repeat, everything within my power, limited only by the boundaries of democracy--to ensure that the mass media will truly play their role, that the journalists will be competent, that the dignity of journalism is enhanced and that Portuguese may not find themselves utterly confused because each newspaper carried a different version of a given fact.

I am not going to list specific measures, I am merely stating an intention, an intention that I am convinced will be carried out in agreement and collaboration with the government to be formed, insofar as I have no doubt that all Portuguese political parties are interested in the development of democracy and in the proper enlightenment of the Portuguese.

[Question] [identification indistinct] What chances do you envisage for cooperating with the government after today's victory?

[Answer] I must tell you that I am not at all worried on that score, and I am not worried for the following reasons: first, because we live in a democracy; second, in a democracy the elected bodies, the bodies resulting from the will of the people, must perforce respect the indications conveyed by the will of the people; so we have a parliamentary majority resulting from the will of the people, and a president of the republic resulting from the will of the people. It is the political duty, the moral duty of these two organs of sovereignty to collaborate, but to collaborate honestly and totally, so that people may be mobilized, resources channeled, solutions found. All this must be done while bearing in mind that in democracy, power, in all its manifestations, is of a transient nature, and that the people, in whom true power resides can at any moment turn the opposition into government and the government into opposition. This means that everything must be done with complete respect for the opposition, trying to keep the opposition apprised of all problems, trying to seek its views on all problems, so as to ensure that the administration will function democratically, not perfectly, but in the proper manner.

[Question by unidentified reporter] Speaking on television a short while ago, Dr Freitas do Amaral stated that he found it necessary to demand that you keep your promise not to obstruct the action of the Democratic Alliance government, and that he thought that for this to be possible you must change your conduct so far of vetoing certain legislative initiatives of the Democratic Alliance. I would like to know whether you are prepared, Mr. President, to amend your conduct as demanded by Dr Freitas do Amaral?

[Answer] With regard to your question, I do not think it necessary to demand institutional solidarity of the president of the republic when in fact this solidarity has always existed. I must point out that I have never obstructed the government's actions. In fact I have often pointed out that of the 700,000 pieces of legislation drafted by the government only 3 remain in my office, and they remain there because of their particular characteristics. Two concern national defense, and I believe that defense, being connected with the military, can only be dealt with by an Assembly of the Republic so that the end product may be sound, consistent and enjoying majority support. A third piece of legislation concerns the creation of a special antiterrorist police unit whose existence I deem necessary while at the same time believing that a body of this nature must be subject to democratic control. It requires sophisticated equipment and the use of this equipment must be under control to prevent deviations. Of course I believe in man, but above all I believe in the rules that curb his actions.

Such are the reasons why these three pieces of legislation still remain to be promulgated. Of course others were vetoed because they were unconstitutional, and still others because I took the view that they were out of keeping with what I saw as the national interest. Obviously I shall conduct myself in a like manner in the future. I shall offer total openness, total solidarity, but of couse I shall not abdicate my powers. [words indistict] but whenever any of the government's attitudes or activities requiring my endorsement fail to meet with my approval, then obviously I shall explain to the government the reasons for my attitude so that through discussion we may find alternative solutions to the problems which the government may be seeking to resolve in what, in my view, may be an incorrect manner.

[Question] My name is Jose Carlos Valente of the newspaper LUTA POPULAR. Mr President, in view of the fact that the Democratic Alliance government repeatedly stated that it would never consent to be in office in the event of President Eanes's reelection and now that over 56 percent of the electorate have voted for Eanes, implicitly signifying that they accepted the government's decision, and, moreover, in view of more recent statements by Prof Freitas do Amaral reflecting doubt as to whether the government would or would not resign, I would like to ask you, Mr President, what attitude you propose to adopt if the government choses to remain in office?

[Answer] As you know, the disappearance of his excellency the prime minister, the unexpected disappearance [words indistinct] has placed the government in a very special situation. From the constitutional standpoint the government hinges totally on the person of the prime minister. With his disappearance the government is virtually merely a caretaker administration and should therefore be replaced. This means that the present government will be replaced sooner or later.

With regard to the situation of Prof Freitas do Amaral I will tell you the following: I take the view that the political situation should be divided chronologically into the period up to the elections and the period after the elections. During the former a political struggle was being waged in a certain way that I would rather not appraise nor criticize at the present moment. But from this moment on the political struggle is over and we must have political solidarity instead.

As far as I know, Prof Freitas do Amaral had adopted his attitude to a certain extent out of solidarity. Due to unfortunate circumstances the situation changed radically as a result of the accident which cost his excellency the prime minister his life. I think, therefore, that he is in a good position at this stage to adopt a different attitude. At any rate, this problem, while obviously concerning me, is primarily a problem for the forces of the Democratic Alliance and Professor Freitas do Amaral to consider.

[Question] Polish television. Mr President, has the support recently expressed by PCP helped you to win the elections in the first round? Or was it inconsequential?

[Answer] Well, obviously the voting recommendations issued by the Communist Party to its militants were reflected in the election results. I would, however, like to repeat that there are no understandings, no undertakings, between me and the Communist Party.

I would like to add that all my undertakings to political parties, to the Portuguese in general, are those contained in the published program of my reelection. They commit and bind me to the Portuguese people, will guide my attitudes and will determine whatever political directives I may issue.

I would like to add that I intend [words indistinct] as I did in my previous mandate, to take into account the interests of all the Portuguese and no other interests. I intend in this mandate fully to respect my pledges to the electorate as I did in my previous mandate, and my pledges to the Portuguese electorate are clearly defined, fully formulated, in the published reelection program. I believe therefore that the Portuguese population is well equipped at any moment to assess whether my conduct is faithful to my program.

[Question by unidentified reporter] Mr President, whom are you going to appoint chief of the armed forces' general staff? And how do you view in practice the effective subordination of the armed forces to the civilian power?

[Answer] I cannot say whom I shall appoint chief of the armed forces' general staff for two very simple reasons. First, because I have not decided yet, and second because even if I had decided I could not disclose it to the gentlemen of the press without first conveying my decision to the military hierarchy.

With regard to the subordination of the military to the political power: Well, it is an accepted fact—I would say accepted by all political groups, or rather, by all political parties—that such a subordination must take place. The military themselves, myself, the Council of the Revolution, have repeatedly said that such a subordination must take place, as established, once the transition period is over [usually taken as the period up to the constitutional revision] and take place it will, and in this regard things in Portugal will become as they are in other Western democracies. The military will be an important backup institution, but an institution to backup democracy, a national backup institution, and no longer a [word indistinct].

I repeat, conditions now exist that will enable the military to return definitely to their normal role, and the conditions are there because the empire no longer exists and therefore the threats that its existence created are no longer there either. There is therefore no need for a huge, and to some extent politically compromised, armed forces. There is now no political dictatorship forcing the military to be necessarily compromised with the political aspect. We now have a democracy, and in a democracy the military has a specific role historically defined and accepted, and this is the role that the military will play in our country.

[Question by unidentified reporter] Mr President, there is talk of a national identity crisis. Could you say whether you believe in such a crisis and if possible give the grounds for your reply? Thank you.

[Answer] The answer to that would take almost a whole day. I shall try to be brief. I would say that yes, there is a national identify crisis. As you know, Portugal was a country with a permanently outward-facing posture. One empire followed another. First the east, then Brazil, then Africa, and now the imperial cycle is over. And this came to pass, not in a normal fashion, as might have happened if the country had lived in a democracy, but in a traumatic manner; traumatic to an extent with which you are familiar.

It is understandable, therefore, that there should be a certain dislocation. But this can and certainly will be overcome. And it will be overcome if Portugal succeeds—and I am convinced that it will succeed—in preserving democracy. If Portugal succeeds, as I hope, in ensuring that this democracy will not be merely political but rather a democracy based on social fraternity, an open democracy therefore, striving at every moment to broaden and deepen itself through the resolution of the concrete problems facing the Portuguese, through a greater concern with justice [words indistinct]. Through a concern for the realization of freedom, but also an enlarged freedom, a freedom marked by the concern to achieve the social fraternity I have already mentioned. If this is achieved then the national identify now to some extent suffering from dislocation will certainly be found again along a European course; but one pursued without giving up all that has historically characterized Portugal, such as its ties with Africa, the Arab world, Latin America, and above all its capacity, in a world in strife, to take the view that understanding is possible, and that this understanding must concern itself with and aim at equity, justice and therefore peace.

[Question] Pedro Cid of RDP [Portuguese radio] Mr President what has so far prevented the full application of the Amnesty Law? During your second mandate, will the necessary conditions be created for its implementation? Another question: What political interpretation if any, should one give to the presence by your side of Maria de Lourdes Pintasilgo? I ask this because Maria de Lourdes Pintassilgo is one of the personalities most attacked by the Democratic Alliance. In this connection I would like to know whether you are still against the government-sought dismissal of Maria de Lourdes Pintasilgo from her ambassadorial post?

[Answer] With regard to the Amnesty Law, as you know it has been implemented in a somewhat uneven fashion. At the moment some questions pertaining to it await legal adjudication. Obviously this question concerns me and I shall be looking into it and seeking to ensure that the law be fully applied without disruption to the military institution or to the life of the country.

With regard to Maria de Lourdes I would like to say the following: I opposed Maria de Lourdes' dismissal basically for moral reasons. She was at UNESCO. She had performed her functions, to put it in a way which cannot be minimally challenged, without being object of the slightest criticism from anyone, from any of the organs of sovereignty. This means that the organs of sovereignty, and also the political parties insofar as they are represented in parliament, thought that her conduct merited no reproach.

Then she was called to the post of prime minister and given the task of ensuring the holding of a free election and seeing to it that the country's most pressing problems were, if not solved, at least steered toward a solution. With regard to the latter part I shall make no comment, with regard to the former everyone knows that she fully carried out her task. She saw to it that the elections were free, totally free, so free that those in opposition were returned to power.

If she had a job that she was doing well, if she was given a task that she performed incontrovertibly well, then it is hard to understand why she should be punished, and obviously I could never allow this punishment. For this reason, and for this reason alone, I opposed her dismissal. Everyone is acquainted with the action of Maria de Lourdes as a citizen, as a government leader and as an ambassador. I think that her action in all these capacities has enhanced the country's prestige. There is no reason why this should not be taken into account. I intend to approach the government to be formed with a view to placing Maria de Lourdes in the post which she not merely deserves but the country demands that she occupy.

PRESIDENTIAL POSTELECTION POSSIBILITIES CITED

LD091001 Lisbon EXPRESSO in Portuguese 29 Nov 80 p 2

[Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa article: "The Presidential Election Result and the Democratic Alliance's Foreseeable Future"]

[Text] 1. The Presidential Election and the Scenarios

The topic of the relationship between the results of the approaching presidential election and the Democratic Alliance's foreseeable future is not exactly new on this page.

We discussed it at length several months ago, when the Democratic Alliance decided to support candidate Antonio Soares Carneiro in the race for Belem Palace.

At that time, the overwhelming majority of other political analysts were pondering over the legislative election and the greater or lesser likelihood of victory for the Democratic Alliance.

At the time, in mid-1980, we proceeded from two prior assumptions substantially different from those preoccupying other commentators on the current Portuguese political situation.

The first assumption was that the Democratic Alliance would win the legislative election easily.

The second was that the presidential election was more important than the legislative election, not only because of the president of the republic's role in revising the constitution but in particular bearing in mind the relations which could be established among the elected president, the Assembly of the Republic and the government, from January 1981 onward.

From this viewpoint it seemed very important to envisage the various possible scenarios in the event of the Democratic Alliance's confirming its parliamentary majority for 4 years and of Antonio Ramalho Eanes and Antonio Soares Carneiro's emerging as the strongest presidential candidates.

2. Soares Carneiro as President and the Democratic Alliance's Immediate Future

What would be the foreseeable future of the Democratic Alliance, its majority and its government in the event of victory for each of these two candidates?

Recalling what we wrote at the time, beginning with the scenario of presidential victory for the candidate supported by the Democratic Alliance itself, this would entail, among others, the following consequences:

Easier functional and personnel coordination among the bodies represented by the president of the republic, the prime minister and the government and those occupying them;

Also simpler political coordination between these bodies and those occupying them and the Democratic Alliance's parliamentary majority in the Assembly of the Republic;

Francisco Sa Carneiro's probable continuation as head of government (which would also mean Diogo Freitas do Amaral's continuation in the posts which he now holds);

The introduction via the presidency of independents belonging neither to the Social Democratic Party [PSD] nor the Social Democratic Center Party [CDS], who have held an important position in Soares Carneiro's candidacy;

A political setback for the PSD and CDS members who, overtly or covertly, do not conceal their support for Ramalho Eanes, whether because they deem this to be the better choice, or because they disagree with Soares Carneiro's profile, or because they do not wish to endanger their political positions excessively or because they find themselves ostracized by their respective parties' political leaderships and know that they will only be able to replace them as the result of a shock which will affect the soundness of the present leaders' position—a shock represented by a victory for Eanes;

A period of functioning of the system of government on the basis of strictly balanced semipresidentialism for about 3-4 years, with an allocation of powers based on tacit agreement between the elected president of the republic and the prime minister, both of them avoiding embarking on a struggle for the political leadership of the Democratic Alliance;

With the approach of the end of the presidential term of office in 1985, preceded by the 1984 parliamentary election, the issue of the more presidential or more parliamentary (in this instance, more prime ministerial) bent of the system of government would tend to arise, while at the same time the Democratic Alliance would undergo important qualitative changes by means of an evolutionary process of political integration, the training of new cadres, the advent of younger members to leadership posts and the replacement of the traditional archetypes of party conduct by new organizational and personal forms of political leadership (an evolution which we compared, with considerable reservations, with what has occurred in the history of the French majority over the last few decades).

This would be the most likely scenario in the event of a victory for Antonio Soares Carneiro in the presidential election.

It is a scenario which would strengthen the Democratic Alliance's political and institutional influence and give its internal unity greater stability, while necessitating inevitable evolutionary changes within it as the 1984 parliamentary election and the 1985 presidential election approach, both of which involve fundamental decisions concerning the Portuguese system of government and the Democratic Alliance's own political leadership in the years immediately following these events.

Ramalho Eanes as President and the Democratic Alliance's Immediate Future

Let us proceed to consider the alternative scenario; this is, the scenario corresponding to victory for Antonio Ramalho Eanes in the 1980 presidential election.

In that event the prospects are radically different.

Francisco Sa Carneiro and Diogo Freitas do Amaral have already announced that they would not remain in government posts, and it is not impossible that they might even withdraw from the Assembly of the Republic, thus adopting stances similar to that held by Francisco Sa Carneiro from November 1977 to July 1978, that is, the period during which he attacked General Ramalho Eanes from outside the PSD through the medium of the party leadership (which, moreover, opposed Sa Carneiro on the basis of fundamental differences, one of which in fact concerned General Ramalho Eanes' political conduct).

Consequently, the government which the Democratic Alliance forms will very probably be neither a strong government, nor a government which Sa Carneiro or Freitas do Amaral would support, nor a government with lasting preconditions for administering the state's political power or indeed for maintaining and strengthening the Democratic Alliance's unity.

In fact the departure of Sa Carneiro and Freitas do Amaral from the government could bring about in principle the withdrawal of most of the principal ministers, even those who, although initially intending to leave government office at the end of the year have now stated that they will reconsider this stance if the current prime minister remains (such as Cavaco Silva and Morais Leitao, who announced this at a recent cabinet meeting).

Other ministers who would leave the government would be Pinto Balsemao, Amaro da Costa and Basilio Horta.

It is not easy to think of other names within the Democratic Alliance as prominent as these for forming the Seventh Constitutional government; thus it would be a weak government.

But, in addition to being weak, that government probably would have no significant support from the PSD and CDS leaders and perhaps for this very reason no prominent figure in the Democratic Alliance would easily venture to joint a government which would serve as a ping-pong ball between Sa Carneiro and Freitas do Amaral, on the one hand, and Ramalho Eanes on the other; a kind of elastic cushion which comes under pressure from both sides and is in danger of being on bad terms with both.

It is a very thankless position to govern on behalf of a majority without having that majority leadership's political support.

For these reasons, the government, in addition to being weak and unable to count on the Democratic Alliance leadership's determined support, will tend to devote itself to handling day-to-day business, in an understandable form of self-defense whose negative consequence, however, will be that of emphasizing its weakness and accelerating its own fall.

A government which does not govern is a contradiction in terms and a political aberration explicable only in crisis situations, such as, for instance, the absence of parliamentary majorities with a minimum degree of stability when close to legislative elections, specifically those resulting from the early disssolution of the Assembly of the Republic.

This Seventh Constitutional government formed by the Democratic Alliance without conviction and for temporary purposes would tend to be short-lived, having little or no power to mobilize and being unable to prompt the Democratic Alliance toward cohesion but, rather, being anxious to find itself quickly replaced in a task which is not at all encouraging in itself.

All that has been said, let it be clearly noted, stems almost obviously from the convergence of two possible developments, whose likelihood has been increasing over the last few weeks (and for this reason we do not even mention other factors, such as, for instance, the reelected president's strategy).

The first is the determination of Sa Carneiro and Freitas do Amaral to refuse to remain in the government if Ramalho Eanes is reelected president of the republic.

The second will very likely be the stance upheld by the PCP following an election victory for Ramalho Eanes, to the effect of demanding on the basis of Sa Carneiro's and Freitas do Amaral's statements of their absence from the government, even as a political consequence of the defeat of the candidate supported by the Democratic Alliance.

Carlos Brito has already been very clear in Coruche, in indicating the possibility of such a demand constituting one of the foremost and strongest issues which the PCP could raise vis-a-vis the Portuguese public after the approaching presidential election, if victory goes to the candidate for whom the PCP will possibly still call on its members and voters to cast their respective votes.

In short, the foreseeable scenario on the basis of the present Portuguese political situation in the event of an election victory for Ramalho Eanes would be a situation of tensions of indefinite duration--tensions which would immediately have repercussions on the formation of the seventh constitutional government, affect essential areas of the parliamentary majority and influence the overall future of the Democratic Alliance itself.

And let it not be said that matters are not as they are, or that we are painting them blacker than they are in reality, specifically for reasons connected with preference for one candidate and antipathy to another.

Everybody has known in Portugal since 1977 that, if there are two incompatible politicians, they are called Eanes and Sa Carneiro. Each of them has done all that he can to eliminate the other, albeit unsuccessfully so far, and that it is only because neither of them has been wholly successful in this rivalry that they have had to coexist in Belem Palace and in Sao Bento Palace, but have coexisted in the secret hope of winning the last round.

Sa Carneiro was hoping to win the last round by driving Eanes from Belem. Eanes was hoping to win the last round by driving Sa Carneiro from Sao Bento.

This is how they have coexisted for 10 months.

Now that the antepenultimate round is over, with the legislative election and the victory for the Democratic Alliance, the great collision is approaching.

It is a moment which could occur on either 7 or 21 December, or it could yet be postponed indefinitely through intensive political and institutional guerrilla warfare.

Because if there is a characteristic which both of them have, it is obstinacy, and this obstinacy could cause the situation to remain still unresolved at the end of 1980.

POLISH CSCE DELEGATE PRESENTS DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL

[Excerpts] Today is the start of the penultimate week before the Christmas break in the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. At today's plenum, the Polish delegation put forward two proposals: one for a conference on cooperation on energy matters, the second calling for another, new conference on military detente and disarmament.

Poland recalled its tradition of supporting plans for disarmament, such as those of Rapacki and Gomulka and, as the Warsaw Pact countries always do, it identified the continuity of the security conference with the holding of the other conference on disarmament. The Soviet Union supports the Polish proposal and takes the view that this should be held with no prior conditions.

To continue we now have an interview with Dr Nowak, the assistant head of the Polish delegation:

[Begin recording] [correspondent] Today the Polish delegation at the CSCE put forward a proposal on military detente and disarmament in Europe. We have here before our microphones Dr Nowak, who is the assistant head of the Polish delegation. Dr Nowak, would you briefly summarize for us the main points of your country's proposal?

[Nowak] Yes, the main point is to make the decision to convene this conference. In our proposal we put forward our government's invitation to host this conference in Warsaw, and we proposed a specific date, namely, 20 October 1981. [end recording]

SOLIDARITY DELEGATION CONTINUES TALKS WITH UNIONS

[Text] While speculation continues at an international level about the possible intervention by the Soviet Union in Poland, particularly since Washington said that the Soviet Army is ready to intervene, the delegates of the Polish trade union Solidarity, who are on a visit to Spain at the invitation of the Workers Trade Union [USO], are continuing their activities as planned.

This morning the two delegates, Josef Przybyski and Zygmunt Zawalski, met the USO leaders to learn about the working of autonomous, independent trade unionism, a subject about which the Solidarity members are extremely interested. This evening the two representatives of Polish independent trade unionism will travel to Seville to establish contacts with the Andalusian workers.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON THATCHER-HAUGHEY SUMMIT

LD082144 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 2023 GMT 8 Dec 80

[Text] A new formalised relationship between Britain and Ireland could emerge as a result of today's most potent ever Anglo-Irish government exchanges in Dublin. And, according to Irish Premier Mr Charles Haughey, the talks with Mrs Thatcher could have contributed towards a solution of the Maze hungerstrike impasse.

A joint communique issued after the discussions dealt with the Ulster hunger strike for political prisoner status in just one 53-word paragraph. But Mr Haughey hinted strongly at a press conference after the British team's high-security departure that there had been a significant behind-the-scenes development aimed at resolving the crisis. He made it clear that both he and Mrs Thatcher considered the position at the Maze and Armagh prisons as "critical and potentially explosive and dangerous." He added that "there may have been" moves recently of which the public was not aware.

The Irish, he said, were convinced that a solution was possible "on the basis of humanitarian aspects of the prisons regime." Mrs Thatcher shared his anxiety that a way out had to be found. Mr Haughey went on: "I believe today's meeting will make an important contribution towards finding that solution."

The two prime ministers spoke alone for 75 minutes during today's 5-hour discussions and it was apparent tonight that the H-blocks controversy had occupied them for most of that time.

Mr Haughey stressed that what they had said to each other remained confidential, and repeated that the H-block position was "very sensitive and delicate." But the communique left little doubt that both governments were pinning their hopes on statements issued last Thursday. This was when Britain's Northern Ireland Secretary Mr Humphrey Atkins indicated that he would be prepared to examine changes in the prison conditions, a comment welcomed by the Irish Government.

Although the H-block crisis was the most urgent issue at the talks, Mr Haughey said he believed the most significant was a decision to commission a joint study into a new relationship between Britain and Ireland. He offered little in the way of details, but did not rule out the possibility of a friendship treaty. "The purpose of the studies is to find the sort of institutional structures that might be brought forward," he said. "I do not set any limit on what sort of institutional arrangements might be designed, as long as they are aimed at an improvement." He claimed that in that direction alone today's discussions had made "historic progress."

Mr Haughey angrily rejected a suggestion that the proposals could be leading towards an Irish rejection of the Protestant-Catholic power-sharing concept in Northern Ireland.

Officials from both governments, as well as Ulster representatives, could be involved in the studies. He thought that overall, the Dublin Castle talks added up to a major step towards finding a solution to the whole Ulster problem. The talks, which involved a massive security operation in Dublin, were attended by Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, Chancellor Sir Geoffrey Howe, and Mr Atkins. For Ireland there was Foreign Minister Mr Brian Lenihan and Finance Minister Mr Michael O'Kennedy.

The communique reported that, as well as Northern Ireland generally and the H-blocks problem in particular, items on the agenda had included Common Market affairs and other matters of concern to both countries. The ministers looked at developments leading to closer cooperation in energy, transport, communications, cross-border economic and security matters, agreeing to pursue further improvements in those fields.

The communique said: "Mr Haughey and Mrs Thatcher agreed that the economic, social and political interests of the peoples of the United Kingdom and the Republic are inextricably linked, but that the full development of these links has been put under strain by division and dissent in Northern Ireland. In that context they accepted the need to bring forward policies and proposals to achieve peace, reconciliation and stability--and to improve relations between the peoples of the two countries.

"They considered that the best prospect of attaining these objectives was the further development of the unique relationship between the two countries. They accordingly decided to devote their next meeting in London during the coming year to special consideration of the totality of relationships within these islands. For this purpose they have commissioned joint studies covering a range of issues including new institutional structures, citizenship rights, security matters, economic cooperation and measures to encourage mutual understanding. The discussions were regarded by both sides as extremely constructive and significant."

Mr Haughey and Mrs Thatcher will next meet in London, probably next June, when reports of the studies commissioned today are expected to be available. A conference to further discuss any proposals that may emerge could then be staged. Mr Haughey's attitude seemed to indicate that the establishment of the studies was a step forward in his aim of securing a bigger say for Dublin in Ulster's future. But he provided few details of what the plans might amount to.

At a Downing Street press conference Mrs Thatcher remained enigmatic about what any new special relationship between Ireland and the United Kingdom could involve. But she insisted that the communique referred to a rethinking of the relationship between the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom as a whole--and not just Northern Ireland. She spoke of the possibility of closer cooperation on economic and security matters as well as an extension of the citizenship and voting rights that Irish citizens in this country enjoy to British citizens in the Republic. Ministers and officials of the UK and the Irish Republic will now start talks in readiness for the next summit in London in the summer.

The prime minister was at pains to stress that today's talks would not affect the status of Northern Ireland. "There is nothing for the Unionists to worry about," she said in relation to any changes in the border. She said there was "no possibility" of a confederation between the two countries, but left an impression that the talks between the two countries would cover a more significant range of cooperation than she is prepared at the moment to disclose.

AUSTRIA'S PAHR, CARRINGTON DISCUSS POLAND, MIDEAST

[Excerpt] London--Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr, who is paying a 2-day official visit to Great Britain, had a 2-hour working talk with his British counterpart, Lord Carrington. Initially the two foreign ministers extensively discussed the situation in Poland and then the Middle East conflict. On this occasion, Lord Carrington briefed Minister Pahr on the problems that were discussed at the EC summit meeting.

Following an analysis of the situation in the war between Iran and Iraq, the planned North-South summit conference, scheduled to be held in Mexico in June 1981, was discussed upon Lord Carrington's request. Lord Carrington asked Minister Pahr for Austrian participation in economic aid to Zimbabwe (Rhodesia).

In the discussion of bilateral problems, Foreign Minister Pahr pleaded for an easing of restrictions for Austrian agricultural exports to the European Community and drew his counterpart's attention to the great burden incurred by Austria through the truck transit traffic. He also referred to the pending Austrian request regarding EC participation in the construction cost of transit highways.

THIRD ROUND OF CYPRIOT INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS ENDS

[Excerpts] The third round of the intercommunal talks ended with another meeting held this afternoon at the Ledra Palace Hotel in Nicosia.

In a written statement to correspondents on the conclusion of the third round of talks, Gobbi, the UN secretary general's special representative, noted that during the last 4 months it has become possible to maintain a continued and consistent dialogue and identify some limited areas of agreement. A strip of common ground has started to emerge, he adds. He then praised the cordial atmosphere that prevailed at the talks. This, he says, will be an important contributing factor for the talks when they are resumed in the new year.

In his statement, Ioannidhis, the representative of the Greek Cypriot side, said that there had been a useful exchange of views on almost all issues in the talks so far and stressed that this would be very significant during the next round. He said that the talks were at a preliminary stage and voiced the hope that during the new round there would be a substantive and constructive dialogue on all issues.

Asked whether a new formula had been agreed upon, Ioannidhis said that the United Nations was making an effort to create a process that would promote the solution of the problem.

In his statement, Onan, the Turkish Cypriot interlocutor, said that during the three rounds of the inter-Cypriot talks, both sides had outlined their views in depth and at length. This, he added, will give both sides the opportunity after today's meeting to reassess the views outlined at the negotiating table. Asked whether the time had come for him to transfer his views on the territorial issue onto a map, Onan said that this could be done after the recess in the talks. Very soon, he added, we will be in a position to put forward something that you call more specific.

Bayrak Radio Report

TA082010 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in English to Cyprus 1730 GMT 8 Dec 80

[Excerpt] The Cyprus intercommunal talks resumed at the Ledra Palace this afternoon. Today's subject was the fourth point of the agenda: the territorial issue, which completed the third cycle of the current round of the talks.

At the end of the meeting, the United Nations issued a communique which said that the meeting continued in the same cordial atmosphere that has prevailed throughout the talks and with the hope that after the recess the talks would enter into a stage of more substantive negotiations. The communique said that the next meeting, on the first item of the agenda which concerns the resettlement of Varosha under UN auspices in accordance with the provisions of point 5 of the 19 May 1979 agreement, would take place on 7 January 1981.

AT081530 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 7 Dec 80 pp 1, 13

[Exclusive interview granted to AKROPOLIS correspondent E.A. Papayeoryiou by Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis; date not given]

[Excerpt] Question: What conclusions from the EEC summit conference have particular interest to Greece?

Answer: Before I reply on conclusions which have particular interest to Greece, I would like to make certain observations which have just as great an importance for our country.

The first concerns the warmth of reception accorded to our country by the European Community. This warmth stems from the confidence of the member states in the importance of our participation in the process which leads toward a unified Europe. The unity of Europe is based on the joint cultural and political foundation of the European peoples which make up the Community and the Greek cultural contribution to the development of this joint European foundation, which is considered a fact by all and is fully recognized.

The second concerns the importance of the fact of our participation in the meeting of European Community leaders. For the first time in its history Greece not only has attended the top European decisionmaking center but it has also influenced such decisions by its presence. From this aspect the participation of the Greek prime minister in the European summit conference, even before our formal accession on 1 January 1981, is an historic milestone for our country.

In reference to conclusions from the conference which are of particular interest to Greece, these are incorporated in the joint statement and can be summarized in the Community's concern over international relations and economic developments.

Question: Why are the leaders of the Common Market concerned over international economic developments?

Answer: The political leaders of the European Community are facing certain international problems which have a direct influence on Europe with much seriousness and deep concern.

Among these I could mention the energy problem; relations with Middle East countries; the development of East-West relations as well as the dialogue between the North and the South. At the same time there are also internal Community problems such as progress in economic unification; implementation of a common monetary system as well as institutional decisions related to the better functioning of the various organizations of the European Communities, the solution of which is not at all easy.

The primary problem, however, which also causes the deepest concern, is the energy problem because it leads toward a deepening economic crisis which in turn affects the economies of both the Western as well as the Eastern countries with all the adverse aftereffects: A deficit in the balance of foreign payments, inflationary pressures, economic recession and increase of unemployment.

With the exception of the superpowers which, for the time being, are self-sufficient in oil, European economy--both in the West and in the East--relies upon oil imports. Until such time as oil is replaced as the primary energy source, which will not be soon, prospects for economic developments in the European area are dim.

A more general economic crisis, however, could lead to social disturbances. Whether these disturbances take place in Western countries or in Eastern countries they remain a danger to East-West relations.

Discovery of satisfactory solutions, therefore, to all these international and specific European problems is imperative because otherwise there will be a danger to social and economic balance in Europe which, if shaken irreparably, could lead to calamity.

Question: What repercussions could there be for Greece from an adverse economic development and what should be done if we are to avoid it?

Answer: So long as the structure of Greek economy has a high degree of reliance upon foreign economy, and particularly on European economy, as its main characteristic, particularly when 40 percent of our foreign trade is conducted with Community countries, and so long as in the energy sector we rely upon oil imports, it becomes self-evident that adverse international economic development and economic crisis will directly influence economic developments in our country. These influences become apparent primarily in a widening gap in the balance of foreign payments and in a rise in the cost of living.

The influence of the international crisis upon the domestic economy is not an isolated Greek phenomenon. It is a worldwide phenomenon because all economies of the Eastern countries--which are supposed to be closed, self-sufficient and directed economies in such a way that they are protected against the fluctuations to which capitalist economies are subjected--are subject to the very same influences of the international crisis and face problems of deficit balances and economic recession with the result that there is a shortage of goods and a high cost of living.

At a time, therefore, when countries far wealthier than we are, such as West Germany or Japan, are faced with a problem of foreign payments balances and unemployment and at a time when they ask their citizens to tighten their belts, then what should we do?

If we are to deal with the mounting economic crisis we must concentrate and intensify all our efforts so that we may increase productivity and production so that unemployment, which we have so far avoided, should not spread to Greece as well. We must increase our exports in an effort to neutralize adverse balances in foreign payments.

We must utilize to the greatest possible degree the increase of our invisible resources, such as the merchant marine, tourism and repatriated foreign currency deposits and, naturally, we must continue with severity our policy of economic frugality and control of consumption. All Greeks must realize that without limiting all their unnecessary expenditures both in the private and in the public sectors, and without cutting down on their continual demands for pay increases to levels which do not respond to the real possibilities of our economy, it will be impossible to organically cope with the serious problems which we have to face.

It is an imperative necessity to cut down on consumption and to increase investments. Investments will increase production, will improve productivity and will increase the competitiveness of the economy. These are goals we must reach now more than ever before thanks to our accession to the European Community.

The government has oriented its economic policy in this direction and it is preparing a special draft bill under which it implements strong development incentives in order to encourage new investments and an advancement of retarded areas.

Question: The government argues that with full Greek accession to the Common Market we will also benefit financially. Is there no danger that this benefit will be swept aside by the effects of repercussions of the international economic crisis on our own economy?

Answer: Our accession to the Common Market will help the solution of problems we have to face as a result of the world economic crisis for many reasons. First of all we will benefit from the assistance of the Community funds and the loan capability of its financial apparatus in the form of new investments.

Our accession will also open up the European market both to our agricultural and our industrial products in such a way that we can well hope that it will contribute toward an improvement of our trade balances. And finally because, immediately after our accession, we will also have direct assistance in the form of subsidies of our agricultural products.

The thought that the benefits from our accession could be swept away, to a certain degree, by the influences of a world economic crisis, even though it may be correct, must not divert us from the fact that if the New Democracy government had not tried from the first moments right from 1974 to pursue and prepare our speedy accession to the EEC, our country today would have been exclusively exposed to adverse repercussions from the economic crisis without the counterbalance of benefits which are certainly expected from accession.

Even the world economic crisis could be handled with greater certainty with the strong European industrial countries as allies and with joint planning than we could have handled it alone and exposed to worldwide economic competition.

Question: What does the EEC represent on the international political level, and what is the degree of its influence on the development of the international situation?

Answer: The European Community incorporates within it countries which in the past played a primary and leading role in the development of worldwide political developments. After the second world war and the development of the two superpowers the role of European countries in world events was limited. Consequently only the closest possible cooperation between the democratic countries of Europe could once again supply Europe with the strength it needed in order to successfully handle its problems and its relations with the rest of the world.

The European Community met this goal. It is recognized as an organized fact over and above nations and it is also accepted--and this is of importance to its critics--by the socialist countries of East Europe, in other words by the member states of CEMA, which deal with it. Special relations are also maintained with it by most of the countries of the Third World which are already being subjected to its beneficial presence.

At all levels of international economic exchanges the EEC, thanks to a unified foreign economic policy and often with a joint foreign policy toward international political crises, succeeds in influencing international political-economic relations. I can, as a result, state that the degree of EEC influence in the development of the international situation progressively increases.

Question: Our country's economic progress presupposes stability, calm and smooth political developments. To what degree is the government in a position to guarantee these prerequisites?

Answer: The fact that economic progress presupposes stability, calm and smooth political developments, is, I believe, a self-evident truth which is generally accepted by the Greek people. The more elderly, in any eventuality, have bitter experiences from recent Greek history.

The governments of "New Democracy" consider it a title of honor because during the past 6 years they were able to prevent violence in our country, they have managed to preserve social stability and calm and they contributed toward establishment of a mild political climate in public life. I believe the greatest majority of Greeks have appreciated this contribution for what it is worth.

The present government is determined to preserve social calm and stability and the mild political climate in every possible way. This depends upon the cooperation of all factors in political life but also upon all the citizens themselves. Anarchist activities at the universities are nothing but deliberate provocations to draw a government intervention by force. The government will not be drawn into a violation of the university asylum and to a militant confrontation with extremist students. Reaction must come from the healthy student area, from university authorities, from Greek society and primarily from those who incite such activities.

Also demands through protracted and obstinate strikes will not be dealt with by force. The right to strike is a constitutionally established right which the government cannot deny. It can prosecute only illegal strikes. As a result the strikes which are, on the one hand, called on the basis of existing laws but which, on the other hand, put forth illogical demands which undermine the country's economy, cause hardship to the social whole and lead to social disturbance and political tension, can be neutralized only through universal reaction and condemnation. There are clear messages through the expressed reservations of the Greek people in answer to such strikes which make illogical or excessive demands. These messages ought to make those who support or tolerate such acts of pressure and disturbance think better. This is because the countdown has started and instead of offering political benefits to the supporters of such strikes it only turns against them.

Question: You have stated that New Democracy will also win the 1981 elections because in their greatest majority the people also approve of the European policy of the front which you lead. Could this estimate of yours not be limited by the possibility that certain parties in Greece may influence the judgment of the people by presenting the danger that the EEC will be calamitous to Greece?

Answer: Despite adverse international developments after 1974 and the world economic crisis the governments of "New Democracy" managed, thanks to the policy they implemented during the past 6 years, to implement and guarantee not only domestic calm, social balance and smooth political developments but also a high standard of living over which many richer countries are jealous.

In order to convince ourselves on this we only have to glance at the countryside and the towns in order to establish that over and above figures and statistics the Greek people have achieved a material and spiritual standard of living which was a dream only a few years ago.

At the same time "New Democracy" evaluated with a sense of responsibility the positive and negative elements and it resolved to pursue the country's accession to the European Community. I am certain the Greek people are convinced about the positive effects of this option and they approve of it. This is why I believe that every effort to present our European policy as calamitous will come up against the contrary belief of the Greek people and will come to nothing. The reality of the next year, 1981, which we will spend as equal members of the Community will be a direct denial of this erroneous and demagogic viewpoint.

This is why I believe that our people, who possess an infallible political sense, will prefer tangible achievements to dangerous experiments and indefinite promises about change. This is because the people know that any unstudied and hurried change would be nothing but change toward the worst. The Greek people know that with New Democracy in the government, approach to progress will be continued firmly without tremors and it is for this reason they will give it the strength once again to continue its work for the country's good.

PARIS REPORTS DECISION ON POLAND, FLEET DEPLOYMENT

[Excerpt] The NATO command in Brussels, has stated textually that if the Red Army were to intervene militarily in Poland, the forces of the Atlantic alliance would not react. In other words, the NATO generals will let the Russians and the Poles wash their dirty linen within the family. In Brussels the Atlantic alliance has declared itself to be just preoccupied, and nothing else. The situation in Poland is preoccupying the Western military leaders who have arranged a light deployment in order to--they say--prevent this situation from extending to other sectors. Thus, Christmas leave has been suspended for the crews of the five warships which constitute NATO's permanent fleet. These two destroyers and three frigates flying the American, British, Canadian, Netherlands and German flags, are at present dispersed between British ports and Cuxhafen in the FRG. They could enter the Baltic together should the situation worsen. On the other hand, NATO's mobile airborne force has not yet been placed on alert. This decision could come tomorrow, but the alliance does not wish to further envenom the Polish affair, and Secretary General Josef Luns said recently: A Soviet invasion of Poland would have incalculable consequences for East-West relations, but it must not be believed that NATO exists to protect the Poles from their friends. So, if they want to intervene militarily in Poland, the Russians now know that they can do it at a reduced cost.

[Excerpt] Charles-Ferdinand Nothomb, Belgian minister of foreign affairs, on his return from Warsaw said that the Polish leaders are determined to continue the process of democratization which has begun in their country and to attain socialism of a Polish character without modifying the fundamental [words indistinct]. His Polish counterpart [words indistinct] before and after the lightning visit he made as member of Poland's delegation to the Warsaw Pact summit. The Belgian foreign minister was impressed by the insistence with which the Polish leaders affirmed that they have the will and capacity to resolve their problems by themselves. PRC WARNINGS AGAINST TAIWAN SUBMARINE DEAL

[Excerpts] The Hague, 26 Nov--The Labor Party second chamber parliamentary group is opposed to granting the Rijn-Schelde-Verolme concern an export license for delivering two submarines to Taiwan. The Democrats 66 are also inclined toward rejection. In the meantime a senior Chinese government official--our correspondent Wilem van Kemenade in Beijing reports--has stated that delivery of the submarines will gravely jeopardize relations between the Netherlands and China. This stance has also been conveyed to Dutch Ambassador to China J. Kneppelhout. In Beijing a senior Chinese Government official has made it clear that delivery of submarines could also jeopardize medium and long-term economic relations. The Chinese authorities accuse the Netherlands of being too pessimistic and impatient about orders from the PRC. Chinese Charge d'Affaires in The Hague Gao Jie expressed the same viewpoint when making representations at the Foreign Ministry last week. Dutch Ambassador to China Kneppelhout was summoned by the Beijing authorities yesterday and informed of the Chinese stance.

POLAND MAJOR ISSUE DISCUSSED AT NATO MEETING

[Text] Brussels--During a lengthy political debate the defence ministers of NATO's European military member-nations discussed the situation in Eastern Europe in general, and in Poland in particular, at their Eurogroup meeting in Brussels yesterday. Dr Hans Apel, the chairman, said that everyone was very preoccupied with the situation but hesitant to say anything or to take up public positions that would in any way increase the tension. It is understood that Mr Pym, defence secretary, made the point, generally accepted by his colleagues, that the Polish question was essentially a political one, about which NATO should not be making military signals. The discussion is to be continued today in the wider forum of NATO's Defence Planning Committee.

In the interests of deterrence, and against what they saw as the unremitting increase in Warsaw Pact military strength, the continued Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, and the growth in instability in south-west Asia, the ministers confirmed the need to upgrade the capabilities of forces committed to NATO.

They reaffirmed the importance of continued support for the aim of real increases in defence spending of the order of 3 percent a year in relation to implementation of NATO force goals; of the long-term defence programme; and of the further measures of accelerated force improvement initiated in May, 1980.

On the subject of theatre nuclear forces, while expressing their continuing resolve that modernisation was essential to meet NATO's needs, ministers welcomed the opening of the United States-Soviet Union talks in Geneva.

Mr Brown, American secretary of defence, had spoken sharply in Washington about America's allies. He said no American Government would accept a situation in which some other country felt that "it's our job to defend them, and they needn't bother to defend themselves."

While this theme will obviously figure in the Defence Planning Committee today, the Eurogroup ministers discussed once again yesterday how better they could inform the North Americans, particularly the United States, just how much Europe is doing.

The Europeans, including France, contribute about 91 percent of ground forces and 86 percent of the air forces (80 percent and 70 percent respectively without France) of the current ready forces in Europe, together with 75 percent of the tanks and more than 90 percent of the armoured divisions. In manpower terms the European figures in peacetime are three million (2,500,000 without France) rising, with reserves to six million. The corresponding North American manpower figures are two million and 3,5000,000 respectively. In financial terms the Eurogroup countries will have spent some $80,000 million (more than pounds 34,000 million) towards NATO's total defence expenditure, of which some $18,000 million (pounds 7,690 million) will have been spent on capital equipment. Between 1970 and 1978 they increased their overall average spending, in real terms, by about 2 percent a year.

In 1981 Euro-group countries' armies plan to introduce 270 main battle tanks and 440 other main battle tanks and 440 other armoured vehicles, 150 artillery pieces, 840 anti-armour missile systems, and 4,300 hand-held rocket launchers. More than two-thirds of this equipment will be additional to existing scales. Similar plans exists for navies and air forces, which include 13 new vessels and a total of 385 new aircraft.

REACTIONS TO GOVERNMENT RECOVERY PLAN CITED

LD091553 Brussels LE SOIR in French 4 Dec 80 p 2

[G.D.T. report "Shades of Opinion Within the Majority: The Flemish Socialists Want Amendment"]

[Text] After the trade union's "no" [to the government's economic recovery plan] the government will have to assume its responsibilities. It has the support of the parties which make up the majority with some reservations.

The Social Christians have confidence in the government and are asking it to go ahead.

The French-speaking Socialists are due to hold a General Council meeting on Thursday. Meanwhile their president, Cools, is issuing repeated warnings to the trade unionists and to those Socialists who are hesitant to oppose the Belgian General Federation of Labor. "I condemn complacency and irresponsibility in all the social partners. There must be corporatism." Taking a defeatist line he repeated that "It is vital to wake up if the situation in the country is not to worsen and lead to a dictatorship."

The Flemish Socialists (BSP) sometimes described as the "spineless" member of the majority or as "enfants terribles", have given broad but ambiguous support to the government program. The BSP is calling for "improvements" in Mr Martens' latest plan but without making this a "casus belli." It is calling for a real parliamentary debate and asking all social partners to meet in 1-year's time to judge the results of the government's recovery plan. "The BSP is loyal but not a sleeping partner," Van Miert said.

After the Christian People's Party it was the Social Christian Party's turn to comment on the social consultations on Tuesday. Mr Vanden Boeynants' party, supporting the line taken by Mr Tindemans' party, said that he is confident that the government will draw conclusions from social consultations and take the decisions which are vital to the country's economic recovery.

The French-speaking Socialists will hold a General Council meeting behind closed doors on Thursday. Meanwhile their president, Mr Cools, is increasingly playing the defeatist. In an interview with the newspaper LA MEUSE-LA LANTERNE he condemned "complacency and irresponsibility in all the social partners. The government has fulfilled its contract toward them," he stated. "I think that unless there is a general awakening, a moral rearmament, the situation will continue to deteriorate; we must then fear the worst, such as a dictatorship."

"Today," Mr Cools, went on, "people, structures, associations and other socioeconomic organizations are incapable of drawing up a common viewpoint which takes some account of the others. They all seem to have resorted to flight, irresponsibility and easy solutions consisting of simply adopting an opposition stance."

BSP: Demands and Requirement

The Flemish Socialists, for their part, convened their General Council on Monday evening. They approved the government plan by a big majority (75 percent of the votes) but they are asking for several "improvements" to the text:

—An assurance that the money made available by moderating wages will effectively be used to improve employment and will not be allowed out of the country

—A stricter pricing policy which would review some prices and reduce profit margins in distribution;

—Introducing an emergency crisis tax for incomes over Bfl.5 million net per year;

—Canceling the 13th and 14th months of family allowances for families with high incomes;

"These demands are not requirements, Karel van Miert explained. The BSP deputies will defend these points during a parliamentary debate which Mr van Miert hopes will be real and broad. "Parliament must be able to play its role and possibly amend the documents proposed," he added.

Mr van Miert says he does not want to undermine the coalition government. "The BSP is a loyal partner," he said. "But not a sleeping partner and some people seem to find that difficult to accept."

The Flemish Socialists are also asking that the results of the government measures be reviewed in 1 year, particularly the result of wage restraint in the liberal professions.

Finally the BSP is demanding the continuation of all early pension measures and training periods for young people and the continuation of the special temporary cadre program (unemployed people given work).

The Opposition

The opposition is, of course, opposing the government plan. "It will not improve public finances or employment," the Walloon Rally said. "Real industrial redeployment is necessary. No measures are being taken against state waste in the infrastructure sphere."

"The government plan," the Flemish Liberals stress, "will have a negative effect on the Belgian economy." The Party of Freedom and Progress will shortly put forward a rival plan.

VAN DER KLAAUW REMARKS ON TAIWAN SUBMARINE REQUEST

[Ferry Versteeg dispatch: "Van der Klaauw Declines To Commit Himself in Maputo, Mozambique"]

[Text] Maputo, 28 November--"I find it very difficult to judge. I do not know how serious it is." This was how Foreign Minister van der Klaauw replied to Dutch journalists in the Mozambique capital Maputo yesterday afternoon in reply to a question about whether Taiwan genuinely wishes to order two submarines in the Netherlands or whether the order is a "political maneuver."

According to the minister, theories are in vogue in diplomatic circles in The Hague to the effect that Taipei could wish to drive a wedge between China and the Netherlands following the recent visit by Prime Minister van Agt and himself to Beijing, but he repeated: "I cannot judge that." When asked whether Taiwan has already put money into the "submarine project," he replied: "I do not believe so."

The Dutch minister added shortly before his unexpected departure from Maputo that the matter has already been extensively discussed with Beijing.

He said that he could not imagine that the Netherlands, following the recent visit by Van Agt and himself to China, would jeopardize the friendly relations with that country. Afterward, Beijing Ambassador Kneppelhout was summoned to the Foreign Ministry and assured that China has the greatest possible objections to a delivery of submarines to Taiwan.

Van der Klaauw did not have the impression that other Western countries would be prepared to build the two submarines for Taiwan. "Moreover, there are very few countries which can build submarines."

When asked whether the delivery of submarines to Taiwan might increase tension in that area, the minister replied in the affirmative. "According to the disarmament note, I must ascertain in the case of exports whether areas of tension are involved. Of course there has been no armed conflict between China and Taiwan for a long time, but the latent danger remains. The Chinese have also said in the recent representations which they have made to us: We are striving to achieve a peaceful reunification with Taiwan, but we do not rule out the possibility of force against a dissident province."

Contact With United States

[Question] Have you also been in contact with Washington about this matter?

[Answer] We are in the process of so doing, but I do not know the result yet.

Van der Klaauw would not rule out the possibility that Taiwan's "submarine technology" would be passed on to South Africa. There are close relations between the two countries, especially in the military field. But he added: "I am no expert. They are not nuclear submarines, of course, but there is a nuclear agreement in the order place with Rijn-Schelde-Verolme insofar as the deliveries of power plants are concerned. And then, of course, we are dealing with the nonproliferation treaty, of which Taiwan is not a signatory, because it is not recognized as a state. In short, there are countless difficulties surrounding this matter."

With respect to current trade relations with China, the minister said: "These are not very considerable as yet, but it is a matter of China's potential in the future. It is an important factor. The shipping is also important. Half of the Chinese shipping traffic with west Europe passes through Rotterdam."

"We have also been busily engaged with the special relations between Rotterdam and Shanghai precisely in order to increase the concentration of Chinese shipping in Rotterdam."

Van der Klaauw's comment on trade contacts with Taiwan: "They are very extensive, and there is no objection at all to trade relations with Taiwan on the part of China. For instance, there is a large Philips plant in Taiwan, and there is also a great desire to cooperate with Philips in Beijing; that is not the problem. They have no objection to cultural contacts, either."

"What they do object to is anything that confirms the Taipei government's claim that it is also the government of the Chinese Republic."

"I Will Reflect"

[Question] A final question: Do you believe that you will still be a minister next week?

[Answer] The crisis is very grave. I will reflect on it on board the aricraft.

SCHMIDT, FORLANI DISCUSS POLAND, EARTHQUAKE RELIEF

[Excerpt] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and Italian Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani called again in Bonn today for restraint in view of developments in Poland. At the end of the 1-day German-Italian talks, the two heads of government told journalists that any external interference was linked with grave risks.

Schmidt stressed that the Polish people ought to be able to overcome the existing difficulties in accordance with their own will. He linked the warning against outside intervention with the remark that for the same reasons the Federal Republic was refraining from making judgments.

Developments in Poland, together with assistance for the Italian earthquake victims, were the main topic in the German-Italian consultations in which the foreign ministers, Hans-Dietrich Genscher and Emilio Colombo, also took part. Prime Minister Forlani thanked the Federal Republic, its citizens and organizations for the "rapid and effective assistance" which Italy had received following the catastrophe. Schmidt said the Federal Republic would also be involved to a considerable extent in the aid measures envisaged by the European Community.

The two heads of government said that they were in agreement in their assessment of the world economic situation and its effect on their two countries.

SPD'S BAHR COMMENTS ON POLAND, RELATIONS WITH GDR

DW081242 Baden-Baden Suedwestfunk Network in German 1300 GMT 6 Dec 80

[Talk by SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr--live or recorded]

[Excerpt] Poland is the talk of the town these days. We are watching developments there with both concern and sympathy. The sympathy pertains to the course of renewal and reforms, as agreed upon and adopted. The concern applies to the question whether all parties involved have, and will retain, the strength and the sense of perspective required by the art of attaining what is possible. If the state, the party, the trade union, and the church say that all this is a purely Polish affair, then one cannot but agree. Europe and quite a few important countries outside of Europe also want it that way.

I hope it will not be taken as an impermissible intrusion if I said that much of what has been agreed in Poland between the new trade unions and the government--not so much with respect to the methods but rather with respect to the material objectives--appears to me hard to attain, in any case it seems unattainable within a short period of time. The economy has suffered a setback which needs to be eliminated first; yet concepts of the 35-hour workweek, as desirable as this goal might be, cannot be attained from one day to the next even by our economy; nobody must forget how much hinges on the result of production, that is to say, on work. Without it, nothing can be had. Not working, after all, constitutes the strongest weapon which the workers have, yet this strongest weapon must be used with prudence, and not every time.

Willy Brandt said the other day that there must never be any policy ignoring Poland again. The European family needs Poland with the experiences of its history, with the discernible national interests that have been marked for many years, with its contribution toward the enhancement of security and cooperation between states of different systems. Europe is inconceivable without Poland, just as it is inconceivable without France, and the special relationship between France and Poland that has emerged from history also contains the element of standing one's ground vis-a-vis the interests of others and those who are stronger.

But this is exactly the situation of Europe, notwithstanding the recognition of the fundamental fact that we Europeans are organized in two alliance systems which are supposed to allow cooperation with each other apart from the protection against each other. The loyalty in the alliance is the precondition for this cooperation; this also applies to Poland, of course.

Interview on Issues

DW091203 Hamburg Norddeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 0615 GMT 8 Dec 80

[Interview with SPD Federal Manager Egon Bahr; place not given--recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] CSU Secretary General Stoiber charged that Bahr represents Moscow's position. Bahr's appeal to the Polish leadership to be loyal to the Soviet Union is treason when it comes to the Polish people's will for freedom, said Stoiber. Do you believe that the Polish leadership had to be reminded of this loyalty?

[Answer] Well, first one ought to have a look at what I really said and not at this. I find it irresponsible of Mr Stoiber to quote an AP version and be content with that. Second, naturally the Polish leadership does not need to be urged to maintain a position. It decides alone what it deems correct and necessary. But aside from that, I am convinced and I will continued to maintain that in line with what we have experienced in the past 20 or 30 years, we see that the position of individual partners in an alliance must be in full loyalty to the alliance, if detente is to continue in Europe. This pertains to Western countries as much as it pertains to Eastern countries. Only if all together, in their respective alliances, maintain uncontested loyalty will we have the leeway we need to implement our own, European interests. That is my opinion and I will stand by it. All our experience supports this.

[Question] Would you like to see this interpreted as a warning or admonition?

[Answer] No, they know themselves what they can do and what they cannot do.

[Question] DER SPIEGEL reported today that East Berlin plans to permit the travel of pensioners to the Federal Republic only in exceptional cases. Bonn says that this is pure speculation. Do you think such a plan is realistic?

[Answer] I did not consider the increase in the mandatory exchange amount, or the doubling of it, as a plan to be seriously considered. We know that East Berlin is good for this kind of surprise. I do not believe the GDR could be interested in something like that at the moment. As the situation stands at present, I do not believe it is more than speculation.

[Question] What consequence would a reduction of pensioner travel have for inter-German relations?

[Answer] They would become even more icy than they are at the moment. As regards the present freezing, we see small signs indicating that the GDR with its--let us say--loyalty to the alliance and no action against Poland is giving signs that one must prepare and take small steps with regard to the further development of relations between both German states.

[Question] Helmut Kohl and Willy Brandt will meet this week for a private talk. Do you rule out that a new version of the grand coalition may be discussed?

[Answer] Yes, I fully rule that out.

JOSEF ERTL CALLS FOR EC FOOD AID TO POLAND

LD091650 Hamburg DPA in German 1348 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] Brussels, 9 Dec (DPA)--Federal Minister of Food and Agriculture Josef Ertl has said that the European Community must help the Poles and "as soon as possible." The EC must not hesitate until "the political situation has become further aggravated and the Europeans have other worries than butter surpluses." Anyone who wanted to eliminate political radicalism had first to fight need, he said. "Butter instead of guns" was the best recipe.

In this connection Ertl again pointed out that the strongly criticized EC surpluses had to be regarded differently in view of food aid to Poland. "If we had no stocks, we could not help the Poles nor the many others who are in need of our help," Ertl stressed.

However, Ertl was not willing to go into details about supplies for Poland. He said that the delicate question of aid should be dealt with without too much public talk. Everyday fresh lists of the amounts were being published, and not all of them were accurate. He stressed that the EC most certainly had an agreed concept already decided upon by the heads of states and governments in Luxembourg. The Community would deliver the goods and the Federal Government would participate in the credits for Poland with a Hermes.

[Press review on developments in Poland]

[Text] WESERKURIER of Bremen writes: Because of the out-spoken West European interest in all the developments in Poland, the People's Republic can reckon with great concessions on the part of the European Community's Council of Ministers. It will be a political decision, costing the European Community partners millions. Butter and beef prices are clearly beyond the world market price because of the European Community's market system, so they must be cut down with the help of subsidies prior to being sold to third countries. Only a few taxpayers, who must after all pay for the transaction, will object to such help, but that has nothing to do with sanctioning the senseless European agricultural surplus production, costing more than DM120 billion annually.

RHEINPFALZ of Ludwigshafen maintains: It seems to be sensible and politically warranted to use subsidies to cut down the food supply prices for Poland to a low world market level. The European Community's cashbox with its subsidies this time will properly cut down the otherwise expensive piles of butter. The additional credits given by the member states to achieve further price cuts for Poland is an additional step. "Butter instead of guns," says Josef Ertl. Well, nobody had guns in mind, but subsidies helping the Poles to master their crisis in a dignified way are certainly more important.

HESSISCHE/NIEDERSAECHISISCHE ALLGEMEINE of Kassel notes: It had been a question whether the European Community's offer to help would be accepted by Warsaw. Poland's neighbors watch out Argus-eyed that the West does not interfere in the internal affairs of the People's Republic. One could pursue a policy also with beef, butter and grain. The Soviets experienced this recently when Brussels refused to supply them with cheap butter. It is the more pleasant then that they are not preventing the generous help for Poland. They obviously hope that this will result in political stabilization and in some relief with regard to the USSR's commitments vis-a-vis the CEMA partner.

FULDAER ZEITUNG points out: We are experiencing in these days and weeks again the uncanny pressure emanating from reports on troop movements, troop concentrations, stages of alert and off limit zones along Poland's borders, regardless whether these reports were planted, triggered or presented by Moscow as denials. Their effects are in every case visible and tangible. The appeals of the Polish party and state leaderships to "save" the unloved "socialist system" and the "alliance" with the Soviet Union are becoming more and more urgent, their warnings against the danger of foreign intervention more and more frank and dramatic.

The daily DIE WELT stresses: For the first time since the beginning of the Polish crisis the Warsaw and Moscow leaderships have gotten into an open conflict. The Soviet news agency TASS maintains that counterrevolutionary groups under the cloak of the trade union Solidarity have acted in the Polish city Kielce against the party and the local plant managements. This TASS report was shortly thereafter denied by the Polish news agency PAP. In other words, the Polish regime energetically rejected a statement by the Soviets. From Moscow's perspective it looks like support and whitewashing of so-called counterrevolutionary elements. In Czechoslovakia it also began with Moscow's accusations that Dubcek and the reformers wanted to give cover to the alleged counterrevolutionists.

SUEDDEUTSCHE ZEITUNG makes the following comments: The ominous catchword of counterrevolution, which in the Soviet script for intervention heralds the counterblow, has been mentioned. This does not have to mean that a military intervention is directly forthcoming but that the arguments have been completed for use with which such a strike could be justified. The joint commission of the government and the Catholic Church urging unity also shows that the danger threatening Poland has not abated. The two institutions, of which at least the ecclesiastical one is exposed to Moscow's most profound distrust, would not come out now in chorus if there were no cogent reasons for doing so.

The editorial of the BRAUNSCHWEIGER ZEITUNG reads in part: The anxiety that the West again does not know how it should react in the event of a Soviet invasion is great and justified. Dying for Gdansk was a well-known phrase prior to the outbreak of World War II, and nobody wants to die for Warsaw, either. Therefore the reaction must be of a political nature. The Western alliance should credibly explain how serious it is about the arms race now starting and about the economic blockade. It is a different question whether Moscow will be impressed.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU states: A military intervention by NATO in the event of an invasion of Poland by troops of the Warsaw Pact is absolutely out of the question. The West will react solely in a political way. If the NATO side nevertheless has taken some measures of military precaution, then it has done so for two reasons: They cannot and will not pretend that the developments in the East bloc do not make any difference at all to the Western alliance. Besides, it cannot be ruled out totally that international tensions will ensue from the political consequences of an Eastern military action.

VON DOHNANYI ASSESSES U.S.-EUROPEAN RELATIONS

[Correspondent Lenz interview with Klaus von Dohnanyi, minister of state in the Foreign Ministry in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] You attended a 2-day conference in London at which the question was raised as to what changes Reagan's victory might imply for U.S. policy with regard to the economic, international affairs, and defense fields. Quite a few prominent advisers of the president elect were among the participants. Were these talks useful with respect to what I implied?

[Answer] I believe so, yes. It was a conference held by a private organization which deals with the assessment of political trends primarily in the United States but to a certain extent also on a worldwide scale, and invitations had been issued to both Americans and Europeans. My assessment is that knowledgeable remarks were made by the European and American sides concerning the probable turn of events in the next several years.

[Question] You mean to say that the U.S. politicians who were present indicated the course of U.S. policies in the future, or does it still stand that everything is noncommittal pending the president's own declaration?

[Answer] It is necessary indeed to wait until the president himself comes out with a statement. Besides, nobody there spoke on behalf of the new administration or on behalf of President-elect Reagan. The experts there spoke on their own behalf, deducing from developments to date what might be expected. But viewing the whole picture I may say indeed that some points stuck out in considerable clarity, among other things the definitely stronger emphasis of the new Reagan administration on the military aspects of security. This played an important role. But they also stated that certain problems and developments will crop up which will not make the answers so unequivocal, for instance, the visible dilemma between the counteraction of inflation on the one hand and the promise of tax cuts on the other, if both these issues are linked up with the intention of increasing defense spending. The matters played a considerable part in the debates among the economic experts in particular.

[Question] Just as you implied, Willy Brandt has said that it all boils down to two problems: One is the tendency of the new administration to impose more arms burdens on the Europeans than they could perhaps bear, the other is the question as to how seriously the new administration actually plans to talk with the Soviet Union about questions concerning arms control.

[Answer] These are important questions, to be sure. I do not care venturing an answer to any of them at the moment, not even after this conference which definitely was very interesting. The Europeans there made it clear that the relations with the United States must be relations based on partnership and even better consultations. I on my part emphasized in no uncertain terms that it was my impression that public opinion and the media were all too critical in their assessment and description of the performance of the Carter administration. I believe President Carter has tried to tackle a number of imminent problems in such a way that chances for approaching solutions existed. Probably the new administration will proceed from tendencies which the incumbent administration, the Carter presidency, has already grasped and promoted. For example, the stronger emphasis on the military aspect, on defense or security policy, did not come up with the new president; on the contrary, we might even say that this has been playing an increasing role in U.S. policy for the past 2 or 3 years and that the new president in a way also succeeded in establishing his vast majority on this movement, on this development.

[Question] Prior to dealing with the partnership problem, one more question about SALT II. Reagan wants to negotiate it anew. Does one know in the meantime whether he wants to stick with the SALT II agreement—as long as new negotiations take place—stick with the existing agreement he does not want to ratify?

[Answer] Well, I believe that all one could say in this connection would be speculation. One of the present senators belonging to the conservative wing of the Republicans, who could possibly make some statements in this respect, said that one ought to hold everything for 6 months and then begin to handle the problem of new negotiations. All agreed that SALT II, in the form it has been submitted to the Senate, could probably not be ratified. SALT II in that form is probably dead. But, as I said, all these statements are not binding for Reagan's presidency.

They are the opinion of private persons or the private opinion of politicians who could act as experts but not as the mouthpiece of a government.

[Question] The European partners want more cooperation with Washington, maybe because they have considered some actions of Carter as erratic, brusque and maybe occasionally as not very professional. But that calls for cooperation--the Europeans want to have more of an opportunity to implement their interests in the policy of the alliance. Is that hope justified?

[Answer] Well, I believe that one must see in this context, more than before, how far agreement exists in the analysis, the assessment of the situation, its origins and its development. I believe that a great part of the existing problems between the Europeans and the Americans--and there are some, there are simply different perspectives from the point of view of the United States and of the Europeans--have come about because they have not taken enought time to analyze developments in the world, particularly in the Third World. They did not try to understand historic developments together and to see where possible differences of opinion exist. I will only name Central America. The Europeans and the Americans certainly have different opinions on the origins and reasons for the developments in Nicaragua, for example.

[Question] Is there no reason for European self-criticism in this connection?

[Answer] No, there is no reason. I believe that the United States has viewed matters there from a somewhat narrow angle, particularly--but this applies less to the government and more to the Senate--from an angle that possibly did not properly take into consideration the historical facts of Central and Latin America. Conclusions may have been drawn sometimes entailing decisions which do not promote their own cause. That applies to a certain extent to the Near and Middle East.

We also discussed the background and reasons of Iranian developments, for example, but that was more a side issue of the conference. It seems to me that it will be most important for the Europeans and the Americans to have intensified talks on developments, historical developments we face in the Third World and East-West relations. On that basis a common assessment of historical and political developments should be achieved.

It is another question whether one will agree on the conclusions and methods; political consultations will take place based on them. It is much easier to agree on methods and conclusions once a common basis for viewing developments has been established.

SCHMIDT 'STANDS BY' APEL OVER TORNADO PROBLEMS

[Excerpts] Bonn, 9 Dec (DPA)--Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel has the confidence of Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and his colleagues in the SPD parliamentary group. Knut Terjung, spokesman for the SPD parliamentary group, said today that following the discussion of the financial difficulties connected with the Tornado multi-role aircraft, Schmidt contines to "stand by Apel" in spite of his annoyance about the problem. Apel surprisingly left the Brussels NATO conference for Bonn to brief the SPD parliamentary group about the difficulties. He is due to return to Brussels later tonight. Terjung stressed in his statement that following Apel's detailed explanation of the facts the SPD parliamentary group saw "no reason" to "put blame" on the defense minister.

According to some of those present, there does not seem to have been a "no-confidence mood" against Apel. Apel is said to have strongly denied that he intends to resign. He took issue with the claim that he wanted "to run away." However, neither Apel nor Schmidt came up with any way to solve the financial problems facing the Tornado aircraft. Schmidt pointed out that the basic decision about the Tornado was taken in 1967 under the then CDU Defense Minister Gerhard Schroeder. Such difficulties should be avoided in the future. Schmidt is said to have recommended that "industrial expertise" be used in the FRG Defense Ministry.

According to Knut Terjung, the SPD parliamentary group was assured by Apel that "no heads would roll" because of the Tornado difficulties. He carries the political responsibility, and he wants to investigate the matter thoroughly.

Apel refused to make any statement to journalists when leaving the meeting. Wilfried Penner, his parliamentary state secretary, said that Apel is ready to discuss the matter with the Bundestag defence and budget committees. However, he will not discuss the matter publicly until it has been sorted out.

LIBYA GRANTS FIRM PERMISSION TO TEST ROCKETS

[Text] Cologne, 8 Dec (DPA)--The Libyan Government has given the German firm Orbital und Transportraketen AG (OTRAG) permission to conduct further tests with the so-called cheap rockets. This was confirmed by the company in an interview given to the French service of Deutsche Welle in Cologne. A rocket of about 12 meters in length will be launched in the next few weeks, and a second rocket will be launched before the end of Februrry. OTRAG's technical equipment has already been transported from Zaire in central Africa to the Sahara Desert in Libya.

Zaire's head of state, Mobutu Sese Seko, chanceled the agreement with OTRAG in 1979 because neighboring Angola and several communist states had expressed doubts that the rockets produced by OTRAG were intended for exclusively peaceful aims.

FRG CORPORATION RECEIVES GDR POWERPLANT ORDER

[Text] Duesseldorf, 3 Dec--The GDR Foreign Trade Enterprise for Industrial Installations Imports (IAI), Berlin, has ordered from the Krupp Trading Corporation, installation technology department, which is part of the Krupp Trust, the delivery of a turnkey steam generating plant for the Jena-Sued thermopower plant. The value of the order comes to roughly DM190 million. According to data supplied by the Krupp Corporation, the powerplant will be converted from oil to brown coal.

It was learned upon inquiry that construction is scheduled to begin in April 1981. Completion is planned for early 1983. The EVT, the Stuttgart/Cologne limited liability company for energy and process technology, will be responsible for the technical installations, while the construction job will be done by the Munich/Berlin Dykerhoff and Widmann Corporation.

L'HUMANITE RULES OUT SOVIET INVASION OF POLAND

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "X-ray of a Lie"]

[Text] An energetic campaign, orginating from the United States but piously relayed by the main channels of the media in France, is at present being launched on the following subject: The Soviets are planning a military intervention in Poland which would certainly have "extremely serious" repercussions at the international level.

What is the basis for this sensational report being hammered out all day long on all radio and television networks for the benefit of tens of millions of French people?

Precisely nothing. No meausre taken by the USSR and no statement by all of its leaders suggests that it is contemplating such a possibility. Quite the reverse. When Stanislaw Kania was elected to the post of Polish United Workers Party first secretary in September, Leonid Brezhnev sent him a message in which he expressed his conviction that the Polish people would be capable of solving for themselves the problems facing the country. Only the day before yesterday the Soviet foreign minister [as published] described the rumors that Soviet Army reservists had been sent to the Polish border as a "provocation."

Not only is the USSR not sending troops into Poland but it has just granted that country a considerable loan--$1.1 billion in hard currency--which its government will be free to use as it wishes, even to repay its debts to the Western capitalist states. This prompted the British REUTER agency to say that "in the view of Western experts the size of this loan indicates that the USSR intends to help Poland considerably in overcoming its economic crisis."

Nobody in Poland, be he government member, trade union leader or leading figure in the world of the arts, believes in a military intervention, neither film producer Wajda, questioned on television during a stopover in France, nor Solidarity trade union leader Lech Walesa (Note 1: Lech Walesa confided to an obviously flabbergasted FRANCE-SOIR journalist: "I know that Poland will be socialist. We were born in socialism and I do not think socialism is bad. Of course there are things which must be remedied and improved in Polish society but we must not go back on socialism. Not everything the previous team did was bad either. Of course, whenever I speak I stress above all what is wrong in Poland because that is my job as a trade unionist. I always draw attention to what is wrong. But when I criticize the Polish regime I am not criticizing socialism."). The Polish deputy minister who is heading his country's delegation to the European meeting in Madrid pointed out that "from the start the Soviet leaders have viewed this affair as an internal Polish affair."

Let us look at what is being said by U.S. or associated officials. Questioned at the Press Club, NATO Secretary General Luns said that he does not believe there will be an invasion of Poland. U.S. Secretary of State Muskie does not believe there will either. Senator Charles Percy, Ronald Reagan's envoy, has just had a long talk with Leonid Brezhnev in Moscow. When he left the Kremlin he said that this discussion had been "extremely satisfying" and added: "We expressed the hope that we have enough in common to work not only for the good of the American and Soviet peoples but also for the good of the peoples of the whole world." It is obvious that if he had believed that a military intervention in Poland was imminent his remarks would have been less agreeable.

However, that is not preventing the campaign from developing behind the scenes. On Tuesday Carter's spokesman convened the press not to state that he has any proof that the USSR is preparing to intervene but to specify--which is slightly different--that such an intervention would have serious consequences. The entire media in France were set in motion, although in their eagerness some people became somewhat confused.

For instance in the same issue of LE MONDE there was a report of "the sound of marching feet on Poland's borders" (Andre Fontaine) as if that were a proven fact, while the Washington correspondent concluded his article in these terms: "There is no indication which enables us to say that the Kremlin has decided on such an intervention." No indication! However, that is not enough to discourage the effort at distortion.

The Nine quickly aligned with the White House, to the great satisfaction of LE MATIN which thinks that "Europe can play a deterrent role in Poland in face of the Kremlin's inclination to intervene." This remark is particularly brilliant since that intervention does not exist. It is regrettable that the Nine did not react as nobly when a military coup, real this time, took place in Turkey, at a time when NATO military maneuvers were taking place in that country, or when the (U.S.) commander in chief of NATO forces and the U.S. ambassador to Rome stated that Washington could not accept the Communists' participation in Italy's government.

Indeed, the mechanisms of this operation are clear. The Americans, loyally followed by their vassals, are brandishing the imaginary threat of an intervention by the USSR in Poland and asserting that they will take the firmest of lines in that case. (Note 2): In fact Luns stated that there would be no NATO military action in the event of military intervention by the USSR. Since this intervention will not take place they will be able to proclaim to all and sundry that it is thanks to their attitude that it was prevented. Hence the formidable din of propaganda which we are now witnessing. You would think that "the voice of France" had become the voice of America.

WARNING OF ECONOMIC RETALIATION IF POLAND INVADED

[Text] Jean-Francois Deniau, the minister responsible for administrative reforms, stated on French Television Channel 2 on Thursday, 4 December, that the Western countries "would draw a number of conclusions" if there were a foreign intervention in Poland. Citing economic exchanges among these conclusions the minister said: "The communist bloc needs us. Foreign trade is, of course, very important to us, but it must not be put before certain priorities."

BARRE ADVOCATES EC 'FUNCTIONAL REGROUPINGS'

[Philippe Lemaitre report on French Prime Minister Raymond Barre 25 November speech in Brussels: "Barre Advocates 'functional regroupings' within EEC"]

[Text] Brussels--The restructuring of the European budget, the organization of a 12-member Community and the reform of the agricultural policy: these were the subjects broached by Mr Barre in his 25 November speech in Brussels at the Grand Catholic Conference.

The problems being experienced by the Community stem largely from its expansion, the premier said, adding that the 30 May 1980 accord on reducing the British contribution to the European budget has brought about no lasting solutions. It is now necessary, therefore, "to lay the foundations on which we intend to continue our work." Mr Barre listed the following six principles: the existence of a major industrial market within a customs union; the existence of an agricultural common market, which is the necessary counterpart to the major industrial market for member states having a strong agriculture; the realization of a zone of monetary stability by means of the European Monetary System--Mr Barre explained that "it is not irrelevant to the future that this pole of stability should tend to attract our Swiss, Austrian and Scandinavian neighbors; the establishment of special ties with the signatories of the Lome Convention; the introduction of political cooperation; and the existence of an institutional system based on cooperation among the institutions.

The development of the Community must therefore take into account budgetary restraint and the exhaustion of "its own resources." The premier was categorical about this: "it would be unrealistic to imagine that we are in a position to contribute further budgetary funds to the Community; the present limit set by the treaty will not be exceeded, therefore."

Next Mr Barre warned against the false hopes that might be prompted by the exercise of restructuring the budget which the Nine will be tackling from next summer. It would be equally unrealistic to impose the introduction of new policies by bans on the budget or to pretend that an increase in spending or a modification of its distribution could miraculously bring about common policies that would strengthen the Community.

Measures of the kind agreed to in May 1980 for reducing Britain's contribution can only be provisional, or they would imply "abandoning the very idea of a community." This being the case, then, what is to be done, since countries such as Britain now and Spain and Portugal tomorrow lack economies and structures which enable them easily to submit to the "original concept of the EEC organization"? Rather than "multiplying ingenious efforts to facilitate their membership," Mr Barre has in mind what has been called a "variable-geometry community": "Can we not envisage...various functional regroupings, as we did with respect to the European Monetary System? Should we not consider how to organize financial solidarity among member countries so as to prevent situations intolerable for certain member states and at the same time the "fair return" which is contrary to the very concept of the Community?" Such an evolution will not exempt the Nine from updating the agricultural policy, which has "aged" over 20 years; but this must be done within "absolute observance" of its principles (market unity, financial solidarity and Community preference).

GISCARD DISCUSSES STRENGTHS, NEEDS OF ECONOMY

[Report on President Giscard d'Estaing's 5 December speech in Valognes: "I Am Proud of Being an Incurable Liberal"]

[Excerpt] Speaking at Valognes City Hall, the president emphasized the need for France to have a "strong, organized and competitive" agriculture. And he continued: "The expression 'France's green oil' which I launched in Normandy 3 years ago has now been well understood. I believe that agriculture is among the economic sectors which have a future." After referring to the annual agricultural conference being held at the Hotel Matignon in Paris at present, the head of state discussed what, in his opinions, constitutes the second pillar of the French economy at the end of the century, namely the "spirit of enterprise" which should assume a concrete form by acquiring markets "in France, Europe and overseas." It is a question, he explained, of having a modern vision "of the wartime captures once effected by privateers from Normandy and elsewhere."

Referring to independence in the energy sphere, which is believed to be the third pillar of the economy in the future, Mr Giscard d'Estaing stated: "The strength of any economy will be measured increasingly often by its ability to acquire independent sources of energy." And he continued: "In order to achieve such independence, France has started an electronulcear program, the most important program of this kind in the world in relation to our size. The electricity output of the power stations which are to be commissioned from November 1980 through the end of 1981 will represent for France the equivalent of the discovery of oil deposits producing 9 million tons annually."

After announcing various measures of local interest (earmarking Fr13 million in 1981 for road diversion round Valognes), the president stated: "Some neighboring and rival countries have begun to envy France the balance and effectiveness of its democratic institutions which General de Gaulle proposed to the country and which I indeed intend to preserve and leave intact."

IEA MINISTERS AGREE ON RESPONSE TO GULF CRISIS

[Text] Paris, 9 Dec KYODO—Japan's energy minister Tuesday hailed here the agreement reached by 21 major oil consuming countries to draw more heavily on their record oil stocks over the coming few months to meet supply threats posed by the Iran-Iraq war.

Rokusuke Tanaka, minister of international trade and industry who is also in charge of the Natural Resources and Energy Agency, was commenting on the communique issued by the Paris-based International Energy Agency (IEA) at the end of a two-day ministerial meeting. Tanaka represented Japan at the meeting.

He said the IEA energy ministers reached agreement "very smoothly" on short-term measures to prevent a sharp raise in oil prices by oil-rpoducing nations and a jump in the spot oil market, hit by a significant oil supply decline caused by the Gulf war that broke out late September.

The measures include the clearing house system--an emergency oil sharing scheme among IEA member nations with the IEA secretariat as the coordinator.

The communique also said the ministers agreed to refrain from a scramble for oil on the spot oil market.

The ministers agreed to consider further action if necessary, including the possibility of adopting a nation-by-nation import ceiling.

IEA officials said the short-term measures would reduce oil imports from the world market to the IEA area to 238 million metric tons, down 10 percent from the 264 million tons estimated earlier.

The U.S. proposal for setting a nation-by-nation oil import ceiling for the whole of 1981 was not adopted because of the strong objections by many other nations.

But the ministers agreed to study further actions, including the possibility of setting annual import ceilings for next year, if it is judged that the IEA area's crude oil needs will not decline so much as expected.

STIRN SUMS UP RESULTS OF LATIN AMERICAN TOUR

[Francis Pisani dispatch: "Situation in Central America Worries France Because of its Responsibilities in Caribbean"]

[Text] Mexico City--"The ties between Mexico and France are becoming stronger, also now at the level of the people," Olivier Stirn [secretary of state for foreign affairs] stated at the conclusion of a 5-day visit to this country. Hadn't almost 100 inhabitants of Vire--a municipality of which the secretary of state for foreign affairs is mayor--been invited by the population of Atlacomulco, about 40 km from Mexico City, on the occasion of the first twinning of municipalities in the two countries?

The Secretary of state had two aims: to chair a regional conference of French ambassadors and to meet members of the Mexican Government within the framework of the regular high-level exchanges desired by the two presidents. The conference took place on 20-21 November. It was attended, as is the case about every 2 years, by the French ambassadors in Central America and in the Caribbean, as well as by the prefect of Martinique.

The problems broached, it is believed, were the stability of the region and the economic and cultural aspects of French policy. "This kind of meeting," Mr Stirn told us, "enables us to define, over and above the bilateral relations with each country, an overall regional policy."

In fact the French Government is induced to draw a distinction between the Caribbean and Central America. On the mainland, its influence is limited; it is aimed, as far as possible, at preventing the region from becoming an area of confrontation between the two blocs. Thus Mr Stirn, who spent 36 hours in Nicaragua, took that country as an example. He expressed satisfaction at the contacts established with the Sandinist leadership, the government junta and certain members of the opposition. "Their three aims are nonalignment, political pluralism and a mixed economy," the secretary of state stated. "I told the Sandinists that we followed their revolution with sympathy and that we would continue to do so if they maintained their aims despite the difficulties. My impression is that they wish to continue in this direction, which constitutes their orginiality."

Specificaly, France has just granted a Fr50 million loan for the construction of a textile factory, which will create 500 jobs. Technical and cultural cooperation between the two countries will increase 82 percent in 1980 in comparison with 1979. "We have agreed to everything that they have asked of us," Mr Stirn concluded.

The French Government has a different approach in the Caribbean, a region to which it is more sensitive because of its presence in Guadeloupe, Martinique and Guyana. Cooperation has recently been intensified with the little island states of Dominica, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and Barbados. The French Government seems less anxious about the Cuban "influence" which is no longer described as "interference."

Assessment of the regional situation was one of the points broached by Mr Stirn in the talks which he held on Monday, 24 November, with Mexican President Lopez Portillo and Foreign Minister Jorge Castaneda. The two sides clearly find it "disturbing and troubled." Another major topic was the preparation of the North-South summit which Mexico intends to organize in June 1981. The French president supports the plan.

Stirn informed his hosts that Paris accepted their proposal of an "overall economic agreement," whose aim is long-term coordination of trade between the two countries. The document could be initialed in December and signed in February, at the time of the meeting of the joint economic commission. Mr Stirn raised the problem of the present state of Mexican sales to France.

"Relations between the two countries are fairly set," a Mexican official told us, "even if they are not as tangible as might be desired. They matter to us insofar as France maintains an independent policy vis-a-vis the United States and thus helps us to do likewise."

The frequent discussions between the two governments were overshadowed this time by the uncertainties created by Mr Reagan's election. In the course of his various activities, the French secretary of state will have had the oppostunity to realize that the closest U.S. neighbors are anxious. Most observers fear that the new president will seek to win some easy victories in Central America, thus giving himself time to study the "serious" dossiers.

CANADA BLAMES FRANCE FOR DAKAR PARLEY COLLAPSE

[Bertrand de la Grange dispatch: "Canada: Government Accuses France of Denying It Access to French-Speaking Africa"]

[Text] Montreal--The Canadian Government has blamed France for the postponement of the conference of French-speaking countries due to take place in Dakar on 8-9 December and postponed indefinitely by Senegal over a disagreement over Quebec's representation.

Canadian Foreign Minister Mr Mark MacGuigan said on Wednesday, 3 December, that he had "the impression that France did not desire the creation of an international French-speaking community" and that it did not want "to open the doors of French-speaking Africa to the Canadians." Paris, he added, would rather keep to its bilateral relations with its former colonies and is not at all keen on Ottawa becoming involved in them.

Prime Minister Mr Pierre Trudeau, who confirmed his interest in the plan to create an "organic French-speaking community" put forward by President Senghor, made known his "disappointment" to the Senegalese ambassador in Ottawa. "Canada," he said, "was determined to go to Dakar despite France's possible absence, though it would have been preferable for it to be represented."

The Quebec government, which would have agreed to join the Canadian delegation on condition that it was represented by a minister rather than a high-ranking official, as Ottawa wished, deplored the Federal Government's "stubborness" and confirmed its "keen interest" in the French-speaking countries. France had supported Quebec's position by announcing that it would not go to Dakar unless "the careful solution of the problem of Quebec's representation gained the approval of the Quebec government."

Mr Trudeau seems to have remained entirely isolated throughout this affair. The Liberal opposition leader in Quebec's National Assembly, Mr Claude Ryan who has hitherto remained silent, admitted on Wednesday that the Federal Government's proposal was unsatisfactory and that it would be "a good thing for Quebec to be associated from the outset with the creation of a group of French-speaking countries."

SENATE ADOPTS UNAMENDED DEFENSE BUDGET 3 DEC

["A.G." report: "Adoption of Defense and Environment Budgets"]

[Excerpts] On Wednesday, 3 December, the Senate adopted the defense budget by 193 votes to 92 (PCF, Socialist Party) without modification. This adoption put an end to a long discussion which began the previous day (and which was interrupted during the night because of the participants' exhaustion) following the rejection of several amendments tabled by the Communists and the Socialists. Those of the former were aimed at the military jurisdiction system, whose abolition was demanded and those of the latter were aimed at increasing credits for the quartering of the mobile gendarmerie.

Following speeches by six rapporteurs, Defense Minister Joel le Theule delivered a speech. He gave explanations, especially with respect to the arms industry--we have exported military equipment worth 20.5 billion, tantamount to 40.5 percent of our arms industry turnover and 4.6 percent of our exports. Referring to the neutron weapon, with respect to whose production a decision is not to be made before 1982, the minister stated that it would make an "extremely effective" defensive action possible while reducing any "side" effects resulting from blast and heat. In conclusion, Mr le Theule emphasized the importance of the credits earmarked for research and proclaimed the "need to have a defense policy irrespective of cost."

LE FIGARO VIEWS DEBATE ON UPDATING FRENCH NUCLEAR FORCES

LD081047 Paris LE FIGARO in French 25 Nov 80 p 5

[Pierre Darcourt article: "French Strategic Forces--'Successor' to Mirage IV"]

[Text] As we know, the SX mobile missile, which could become operational relatively soon, will be one of the new generation of strategic nuclear arms.

It will be a missile with a "spinning" warhead (able to maneuver at the end of its trajectory to avoid any ground-to-air defenses) and a 4,500 km range. It will be easy to conceal both the launchpad and the missile itself since the SX is compact (7-8 meters long) and so is its launch command post (a mere 1 cubic meter). It will be possible to install this mobile missile on unmarked trucks and move it by either air, rail or water.

The 18 Albion Plateau missiles, which are being replaced with new and more effective megatonic S-3 missiles with a range increased to 4,800 km and "harder" delivery vehicles and warheads which will enable them to penetrate the adversary's defenses more easily will probably be retained to 1990 and beyond. However, military experts are wondering anxiously about a political decision still to be made. What is to be decided is whether the manned strategic component, now represented by 42 Mirage IV bombers which will become obsolete around 1990, is to be retained or abandoned.

Insofar as its significance is concerned, the shedding of this strategic air force would affect the power of the air force to a similar extent as scrapping aircraft carriers would affect that of the navy. Air Force men, who are aware of this handicap but have had to behave like administrators for the past several years, realize that, unfortunately, in view of the air force budget it is impossible to finance a new third strategic component. Above all, they are aware that, unless it is prepared to lose all credibility, our air force must under no circumstances let the number of combat aircraft fall below the strategic 500 figure. Otherwise the French Air Force would fall behind countries like Israel, Sweden and some others. In any case, the task of maintaining it at this level and also budget considerations have forced the government to abandon the idea of building a combat aircraft of the future--a variable-geometry high performance (Mach 2.7) twin-jet aircraft.

It would be interesting to consider relatively the advantages and disadvantages of piloted and "preprogrammed" strategic strike forces. Missiles have the following advantage: They can be launched from national territory. Any preventive strike against a launch site would evoke an immediate, automatic response.

On the other hand, they constitute immovable targets exposed to pretargeted nuclear strikes. Once launched, their programmed trajectory cannot be altered. In the event of any crisis, putting their launch sites on alert, which takes 2 minutes, is invisible and, consequently, undetectable by an adversary. In military terms, they lend themselves to no "gesticulation." Conversely, aircraft can move, take off and very soon adopt a survival position. Once deployed, their strike capability can be detected by the enemy observation system. A strategic or tactical bomber carrying its nuclear payload and with its pilot at its controls is no rigid robot but an intelligent machine which can make itself visible and enable the government to show great political flexibility as far as threat graduation is concerned.

It is estimated that 60 percent of committed Mirage IV aircraft would be able to get through and reach their targets. In order to reduce their vulnerability, the air force is to equip them with 150-300 km range ASMP air-to-ground missiles. This will enable the aircraft to advance and drop their payloads on their targets from a distance with greater accuracy and reduce the risks run by the pilots.

Engineers, technicians and pilots, who have been gaining experience for the past 20 years, feel sure that it is necessary to perpetuate the third strategic air component. The Soviets and the Americans, who have a formidable arsenal of ballistic missiles, have nonetheless maintained a fleet of strategic bombers which they have been continually improving. If France were to fail to ensure that its strategic air force is replaced, it could well deprive itself of a major political and military advantage. As we have already stated, the air force budget is insufficient to enable it simultaneously to implement two major programs--deploying the Mirage 2000 aircraft and acquiring the Mirage 4000 aircraft, the two obvious successors to the Mirage IV.

The only way to resolve this crucial problem would be to make the joint defense budget (which includes credits earmarked for the development of the three branches' major programs) responsible for the financing of any future piloted strategic component, as it was the case with respect to the building of our nuclear submarines.

SOCIALIST QUESTIONS USSR NUCLEAR SUPERIORITY

LD080931 Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Nov-1 Dec 80 p 8

["A.G." report: "Mr Hernu Disputes the Theory of USSR Nuclear Supremacy"]

[Text] Charles Hernu, PS deputy for Le Rhone and PS national delegate for military affairs, has published a leaflet entitled "We...the Superpowers," in which he denounces in particular the theory that the Soviet Union has supremacy over the United States in the nuclear arms sphere. He asserts that the reverse is true.

"In all weapons systems," he writes, "the United States has virtually a generation's advance over the USSR.... The USSR has 6,000 nuclear warheads and the United States has 10,000. If SALT II is not ratified the USSR will have 12,000 warheads and the United States 15,500.... The United States has total superiority in guidance systems.... It is irresponsible to speak of an imbalance in the USSR's favor."

This alarmist propaganda, the Socialist official states, is in danger of dragging France into a ferment of extreme Atlanticism. Mr Hernu asks, by resorting to neutron weapons and strengthening conventional weapons, is Valery Giscard d'Estaing going to directly join this system? This is a system in which it seems that the two superpowers, if they are one day to fight, have decided to do so in Europe, and are prepared to recognize the mutual "sanctuarization" of their territories.

Faced with this danger and in the absence of a Europe which does not exist in the military sense, Mr Hernu sees only one solution: To remain faithful to the doctrine of massive nuclear response, to give preference at present to the nuclear submarine deterrent force (constructing four more nuclear submarines in the next 20 years and drawing up plans to extend their base on the Crozon Peninsula), and to fiercely defend the principle of national independence and freedom of decision in nuclear matters.

This policy does not rule out the search for a monitored disarmament solution. Mr Hernu advocates convening a collective security conference in Europe in which the two superpowers would take part. However, in the short term this policy implies a series of industrial, economic, military and psychological measures on which the present government is turning its back, according to the PS deputy.

PCF OFFICIALS MEET WITH KAMPUCHEAN DELEGATION

[Unattributed report: "France Must Cooperate With Kampuchea"]

[Text] For the first time since the overthrow of Pol Pot's dictatorship, a delegation from the People's Republic of Kampuchea [PRK] has been able to visit France at the invitation of the Association for the Development of Relations with Kampuchea. The delegation comprises Khieu Kanharith, journalist and writer, and Chea Thang, who is a doctor, and has spent almost 4 weeks in our country during which it has in particular been able to establish various official contacts. Its visit is now drawing to an end. The delegation was received at PCF headquarters yesterday by Central Committee Secretary Maxime Gremetz and foreign policy section member Max Zins.

On the occasion of this friendly meeting the Kampuchean delegation described the present situation in Kampuchea. Life is starting anew in this country which has been liberated from one of the bloodiest tyrannies in the world for more than 1 year now. The country's economic and social foundations have been laid. The essential conditions for a resumption of normal development have been created.

The Kampuchean people have won back the means of living a free and happy life in peace and independence. However, the means which Kampuchea has are still inadequate in view of the enormous task of rebuilding which still has to be accomplished. That is why international cooperation with Kampuchea remains necessary.

Maxime Gremetz recalled the active solidarity which the PCF has shown the Kampuchean people and reiterated the French Communists' intention to support them in their rebuilding and development work. He gave an assurance that the PCF will spare no effort to ensure that France delays no longer in restoring normal diplomatic relations with the PRK Government and develops a policy of cooperation with it in keeping with the interests of the two peoples and the two nations.

Finally Maxime Gremetz expressed satisfaction at the PRK delegation's visit to France and at the many and varied contacts it established there.

L'HUMANITE REJECTS REPORT OF PCF LEADERSHIP SPLIT

LD091121 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 28 Nov 80 p 1

[Text] After French Television Channel 2 it was Channel 3 which yesterday turned its cameras on Francois Mitterrand, on the pretext of his book. However, no television network has yet invited Georges Marchais to come and talk about "Hope for the Present". As for AFP, it carried out a despicable maneuver yesterday which prompted the following communique from the PCF leadership:

"AFP has just published a communique on so-called differences of opinion within the PCF leadership. The PCF Secretariat wishes to express outraged protest at this new lie, which has been completely trumped up by the Elysee propaganda services.

"This is one more step in the intensive use of all the main sections of the media against the PCF and its candidate Georges Marchais. The recurrence of such practices is bound to increase the disgust felt by all democrats and provoke a strong protest from them. [Signed] The PCF Central Committee Secretariat, Paris 27 November 1980."

Press Bureau Communique

LD081147 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 29 Nov 80 p 4

[Text] The PCF Press Bureau published the following communique yesterday:

On 27 NOvember AFP published a lengthy dispatch claiming, quite unfoundedly, that there were disagreements within the PCF leadership. On learning of this our party secretary general issued a formal and critical denial which he asked AFP to publish.

The AFP management refused, stating that it did not want to publish a statement challenging its "credibility."

In other words, AFP is entitled to spread false, lying and slanderous information, while the PCF, the party concerned, does not have the right to reestablish the truth!

This is how the Elysee's men use a public service under this regime.

This is how they view information and pluralism.

This is why Pierre Juquin, on the PCF Press Bureau's behalf, today sent AFP Chairman Mr Pigeat a letter protesting most strongly against this partisan manipulation and censorship.

The Press Bureau alerts the public to the extremely serious nature of what is happening within AFP.

FORMER L'HUMANITE JOURNALIST EXPELLED FROM PCF

LD081053 Paris LE MONDE in French 5 Dec 80 p 10

[Text] Former L'HUMANITE correspondent in Warsaw Mr Pierre Li has been summoned by the PCF cell to which he belongs in the Paris 18th Arrondissement to explain an article which he published in LIBERATION on 3 December. In the article, signed also by former L'HUMANITE social affairs desk assistant chief Jean Weber, Mr Li said that he would not be voting in the presidential elections for "the Communist Party leadership's candidate."

Following this meeting, Mr Li received a letter early this week from the secretary of the cell, dated 22 November. It states that his attitude and stances are considered by his cell "incompatible with his membership of the party." The letter continues: "The cell has therefore decided that it is justified in considering that, because of his fundamental divergences, Pierre Li has placed himself outside the party."

JOINT PS-PCF PARTICIPATION IN GOVERNMENT POSSIBLE

LD091631 [Editorial Report] Paris LE MATIN in French on 4 December 1980 carries on page 3 a 800-word Alexis Liebaert report on an interview granted to Paris Radio by PS National Secretary Lionel Jospin on 3 December. Asked with which parties the PS would govern if PS First Secretary Francois Mitterrand were elected president in 1981, Jospin replied "if a Socialist president is elected in May 1981 it will be because the left has united in the second round and the PCF has changed its policy under pressure from the voters.... In that case it is conceivable that the PCF leadership will participate fully. In any case we are prepared for it to do so."

Asked whether the PS can envisage governing with Gaullist ministers one day, Jospin reportedly replied: "That depends on the Gaullists' political choices."

POLLS CONDUCTED ON PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Giscard Improvement

LD091443 Paris LE MONDE in French 7-8 Dec 80 p 16

[Text] Mr Giscard d'Estaing has gained 3 points according to the SOFRES barometer published in FIGARO magazine's Saturday (6 December) edition; 53 percent of the people interviewed trust him, compared with 50 percent in November.

The number of people with an unfavorable opinion of him has decreased--46 percent of the French people did not trust him last month; this proportion has decreased to 42 percent in December. However, Mr Raymond Barre has lost ground. The premier has lost 1 point--33 instead of 34 percent--and Mr Peyrefitte has lost 3 points--19 instead of 22 percent. Michel Rocard is still in the lead among personalities whom the French would like to play an important role but he has lost 2 points (49 percent instead of 51 percent). Mr Mitterand has gained 1 point (32 instead of 31 percent) and Mr Jacques Chirac has lost 1 point (31 percent instead of 32 percent). The opinion poll was carried out from 20 through 26 November among a national sample of 1,000 persons representative of people aged 18 and over.

Attitudes on Marchais

[Text] An opinion poll carried out by SOFRES for 10 provincial dailies between 9 and 13 November based on a sample of 1,000 people indicates that 75 percent of the people questioned think that PCF presidential election candidate Georges Marchais "does not have the personal qualities of a president of the republic." Some 62 percent of PCF sympathizers think Mr Marchais does have those qualities while 32 percent are of the opposite opinion.

If Mr Mitterrand should lead Mr Marchais in the first round, 39 percent of Communist sympathizers would like Marchais to call on his votes to vote for the Socialist candidate in the second round, 25 percent would prefer him to appeal for abstention and 25 percent do not want him to take up any position in public. If Marchais were to call on his voters not to vote for Mitterrand, 47 percent of PCF sympathizers would ignore him, 24 percent would submit a blank ballot paper, 13 percent would not vote and 9 percent would vote for a majority candidate.

PCI REACTIONS TO SITUATION IN POLAND

Directorate Cables CPSU

LD091820 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0700 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] The PCI Directorate has sent a letter to the parties of the Soviet Union and other Warsaw Pact countries. The letter clearly states that military intervention to break up the process of reforms in Poland would represent an act causing irreparable consequences for relations between the PCI and the East European parties. Brezhnev's personal representative, Zagladin, who is on a visit to Italy, will also be informed about the letter and the PCI stance during his meeting with leading Italian Communist leaders at the Botteghe Oscure [PCI headquarters in Rome] today.

Warns Warsaw Pact States

[Unattributed report: "Poles Alone Must Resolve Their Problems"]

[Excerpt] Rome--PCI Directorate member Comrade Paolo Bufalini has released a statement to L'UNITA concerning reports and hypotheses of possible attitudes on the part of Warsaw Pact countries with respect to current events in Poland. "We publicly confirm once again," Bufalini said, "that we would regard a military intervention in Poland by the Warsaw Pact countries as a very serious matter, entirely unacceptable to us. We agree with what Kania said about 'regeneration without anarchy' but still believe that the struggle to resolve the Polish crisis must be waged by the Polish working class, the Polish people and the Communist Party, independent of any pressure or interference, even from other communist parties or socialist countries. It is a matter of principle which we consider fundamental, both with regards to building socialist societies and with regard to international detente and the safeguarding of peace." Bufalini concluded, "We have expressed these stances not only in public, but also directly and in the clearest and most specific way to the communist parties of the socialist countries concerned."

COLOMBO ON EFFORTS TO 'KEEP EAST-WEST DIALOGUE OPEN'

LD081341 Rome L'ESPRESSO in Italian 30 Nov 80 p 265

[Unattributed interview with Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo: "Cold, Cool; No! Tepid"]

[Text] [Question] You visited Moscow recently. Did your meetings with Soviet Government representatives lead to a reopening of Italian-USSR economic relations? What has been paralyzed by the past few months' "freeze?"
[Answer] Even before the Afghan invasion we were discussing with the Soviet Union the renewal of the agreement on credit lines granted by us, which had expired. There was no agreement on the terms of the renewal. We will have to talk further about financial problems connected with trade. The fact is that the world financial situation has changed a great deal since the agreement on credit lines was concluded, and this must be taken into account. We are looking at trade relations and financial relations which are to our mutual advantage. It is true that in recent months we have carried out no trading operations or deliveries as spectacular as some in the past, but it is also true that we have financed some old and some new ones. Therefore, I consider it inappropriate to talk about a "freeze." In any case our talks will become more specific in the weeks ahead; the joint committee will meet and negotiations can start, with our political backing, on Italian participation in building the gas pipeline and the supply of Soviet gas.

[Question] You say there has been no freeze. And yet economic relations between Italy and the USSR were effectively paralyzed by Cossiga's first government following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. What has changed so much now to prompt talk of a thaw?

[Answer] In Moscow we discussed economic matters very calmly and in an atmosphere relaxed enough to convince me that the Soviet Government has accepted the viewpoint which I indicated to it. I can add that all these matters will definitely be further analyzed by the Italian-Soviet joint committee. You see, the cost of money now is no longer what it was; East credit operations are therefore extremely expensive and often cost the state budget a considerable percentage of the value of the supplies. It seems right to me that in the taxpayer's interest we assess in each individual case the importance of these operations in relation to the general state of our economy and in relation to what we should be doing with regard to options which are, after all, global.

[Question] What about Afghanistan....

[Answer] The fact that this problem coincided with a particular political phase has prompted people to interpret certain pauses for reflection and analysis from a viewpoint which is not the only possible one and in any case is not the most appropriate one. I would like to add that our line of conduct has been no different from that followed by other countries. We have watched the evolution of competition very carefully and I do not feel that it can be claimed that this or that country acted any differently to gain advantages. One indication of this is that the problems have been the same for everyone.

On the other hand, detente is a process which affects all the various fields of international relations (including the economic field) while at the same time being nurtured by these relations. In other words, the development of the detente process facilitates the intensification of economic relations and vice versa. This is a thesis which I presented to the Soviets, to whom I also stressed the priority importance which we attach to a solution in Afghanistan, with a view to the full resumption of the detente process.

[Question] You also visited the United States recently. Were Italian-USSR relations discussed on that occasion? What does the Carter administration think of Italian-USSR economic relations?

[Answer] In September we discussed with the secretary of state the various aspects and the future of detente. Obviously in this context we also broached the subject of relations with the Soviet Union. I informed the secretary of state of my plans to visit Moscow, the invitation for which was confirmed to me in New York by Gromyko, just as I informed all the European partners of it in accordance with what is now common practice among the Western allies. We are moving in the same direction as these latter countries, especially the Germans, with a view to keeping the East-West dialogue open.

BERLINGUER INTERVIEWED ON INTERNATIONAL TOPICS

LD091603 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 27 Nov 80 p 20

[Unattributed report: "Berlinguer Talks to RINASCITA About Post-Carter United States and Europe's Role"]

[Text] The international situation following Reagan's election to the U.S. presidency, the battle for disarmament, relations between the major powers and Europe's role are the main topics in a lengthy interview which Comrade Enrico Berlinguer has granted to RINASCITA and which appears in the issue of the weekly on the newsstands tomorrow.

The first question concerns the "Reagan effect" on Europe and Italy.

[Question] Is a negative repercussion to be taken for granted?

[Answer] I believe it is too early to say. Indeed, Carter's defeat shows that we are witnessing in the largest capitalist country another major manifestation of the inadequacy of the present structures of state intervention in tackling an economic crisis that is structural and which exhibits qualitatively new aspects compared to other crises. In the absence of a credible regenerative answer to it, the response has been a return to the past not dissimilar to the turning point which occurred earlier in Britain. Such a return to the past can undoubtedly create problems for Europe and Italy by encouraging the rightwing forces, but it is not such as to reveal a hegemonic plan and a long-term outlook.... The danger, nevertheless, is that the unrealistic nature of the response will impart a thrust toward rash solutions linked with rearmament and a more aggressive policy, both domestic and international. However, there are very major forces both in Europe and in Italy which are both willing and able to oppose tendencies of this kind.

[Question] What kind of relations will be possible between Italy and Reagan's United States?

[Answer] Let us wait and see with all necessary prudence what the reality of Reagan's United States proves to be. Nevertheless, "the problem is not to see whether positive relations are possible with the United States but how to work to ensure that we have with it friendly relations that are not submissive and which indeed, are such as to enable Italy, under the banner of detente and cooperation, to maintain constructive and friendly contacts with the USSR, the other socialist countries and the developing countries."

[Question] The most important point on which these relations must center is disarmament.

[Answer] We know that this is no simple matter. It demands that we work to modify the conditions which have led to the present tensions, to reestablish a minimum of trust between the USSR and the United States, between the Atlantic pact and the Warsaw Pact.... It seems to me that a positive approach is taking shape on this point in Europe. One sign of this are the conclusions reached at the Socialist International congress. This is why we must insist, in the absence of anything better, on the implementation of the SALT II agreement and at least on the introduction of regional disarmament programs, above all to prevent Europe from becoming a site for the further deployment of nuclear missiles. The proposals put forward in this connection by our party, which were addressed both to the United States and to the Soviet Union, retain all their dramatic topicality.

[Question] How can the mutual fear which characterizes USSR-U.S. relations be lessened?

[Answer] "The starting point is that in both cases it is a real fear, felt and experienced as such by the vast majority of the populations of both major powers" following the crises of international order which characterized the cold war years. Both the United States and the USSR are afraid of the other side gaining power advantages from this crisis. Moreover there are the following specific factors: the USSR fears the development of U.S.-Chinese relations; the United States fears the danger of further acts of force following the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan (and support for Vietnamese military initiatives in Kampuchea).

"In this framework, I regard as a positive factor the emergence of stances which, on the one hand, are truly autonomous from the state logic of the two major powers and, on the other, are not aimed at unilateral breakaways from the alliances. The stances adopted by several nonaligned countries, above all, are moving in this direction. But Italy too can perform a major positive role within the EEC and NATO, in agreement with the other European countries and within a positive rapport with the nonaligned countries."

As for Europe's role, Berlinguer said: "I believe there is a pressing need primarily for a global solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict based on the recognition of the right to existence and security of all the states of the region including Israel and the recognition of the Palestinian people's right to create their own state." Following the Camp David impasse, "there is both a great need for and great expectations of new initiatives, which could come especially from Europe and which would take into account the need for a rapprochement on the problems of the entire Middle Eastern area between the U.S. and USSR stances."

With reference to the necessary initiatives to create a new economic and monetary order, Berlinguer asks, however, "how the Italian Government can act in the direction of economic cooperation based on new foundations until it become credible on the political and moral plane. A state identified with 'kickbacks' and scandals is certainly not in the best position to propose a policy of cooperation based on mutual advantage to the oil producing countries." This is one reason why it demands the participation of "not only the governments but also the political and social forces, primarily the ones representing the working classes."

[Question] What is the reason for the decline in the Italian people's masses' commitment with respect to foreign policy?

[Answer] First, because the correct abandonment of old propagandist oversimplifications led to the error of neglecting the party's involvement in big mass campaigns on the topics of peace. There is also the effect of the disappointment with the very complex and contradictory phases now being experienced by the just struggles waged by some peoples for their own liberation: I am thinking of Vietnam, Kampuchea and the events in certain African countries. I believe, however, that the Italian people--and especially the younger generations--are still very senstitive and attentive toward the problems of peace and war and of aiding the major areas of backwardness and famine..... There are therefore possibilities--as well as he need--for the resumption of a broad mass movement for peace, disarmament, cooperation and new internationalism.

AMARAL WARNS OF LISBON REACTION TO INVASION OF POLAND

[Excerpts] After reading the Council of Minster's communique yesterday, Freitas do Amaral replied to reporters' questions about Portugal's attitude toward a possible Soviet invasion of Poland. Freitas do Amaral replied:

[Begin recording] The Portuguese Government has a series of concrete measures in store for the possibility of a Soviet intervention in Poland. Nevertheless, we would like to believe that no such intervention will take place, because if it did, it would have very grave consequences for the international situation and for European detente. As I disclosed a few days ago, the Portuguese Government has already summoned the Soviet ambassador to Lisbon to convey our concern over the possibility of a Soviet intervention in Poland and to tell him that should such an intervention occur, we would condemn it vigorously and would be bound to adopt steps commensurate with the gravity of the situation. [end recording]

AMARAL WILL NOT TAKE FUTURE GOVERNMENT POST

[Excerpts] After being received this afternoon by President Ramalho Eanes to formally submit the government's resignation, Prof Freitas do Amaral announced at an impromptu news conference that he will not be taking part in the next government.

He explained that his decision not to be in the seventh constitutional government may contribute toward a more balanced executive, because the disappearance of the traditional leader of the Social Democratic Party, Sa Carneiro, will thus be balanced by his own withdrawal from government as the traditional leader of the Social Democratic Center Party. In so doing he hopes to forestall a certain destabilization in the government. He will, however, retain his parliamentary seat.

Freitas do Amaral said that the Democratic Alliance's presidential strategy was defeated in Sunday's elections, and the Alliance must now therefore revise its strategy. He said that he believes that the appointment of a new prime minister will be settled within the next 2 weeks. He declined to comment on possible appointees.

PRESIDENCY COMMUNIQUE ON GOVERNMENT'S RESIGNATION

LD092244 Libson Domestic Service in Portuguese 2200 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] The following is the text of a communique from the Presidency of the Republic:

In the wake of the death of the prime minister, Dr Francisco Sa Carneiro, the government has deemed it necessary to present today its resignation to the president of the republic, through the caretaker prime minister. Although the constitution makes no provision for such an eventuality, it cannot but be interpreted that, since the whole government structure rests on the prime minister, his death makes it automatically incumbent on the government to resign without prejudice to its members' continued stay in office in terms and for the purposes of article 189/4 of the fundamental law.

Therefore, the president of the republic, following a meeting in his office with the caretaker prime minister, today signed the relevant decree of the government's resignation. However, the members of the government are to stay in office until a new cabinet is sworn in, thereby ensuring the management of the running of affairs of state.

As prescribed in the constitution, consultatins with the parliamentary parties should have begun immediately for the purpose of nominating a new prime minister. But, taking into account the situation brought about by the sudden death of the leader of the Social Democratic Party, the president of the republic has decided to meet with representatives of the component parties of the Democratic Alliance before beginning the nominating process.

FINLAND

FINNISH-SOVIET TRADE TO INCREASE IN 1981

LD101012 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 1530 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] Trade between Finland and the Soviet Union will clearly increase next year from this year's level. In exports the metal industry is the most important; the share of metal industry porducts is almost half the goods to be delivered by Finland to the Soviet Union. In imports the most important is energy, above all crude oil. Ilpo Ropponen examines Finnish-Soviet trade:

Although we now know the most important figures for Finnish-Soviet trade next year, the agreement itself has not yet been signed. The official signing will not take place until January, at the request of the Soviet Union. But the agreement has been fully negotiated and it can be implemented immediately after the turn of the year.

Next year's trade does not contain any surprises this time either, but it has positive features. From this year's level, trade will increase by at least 10 percent.

This year's Finnish-Soviet trade will amount to about 22 billion Finnish Markka [Fmk]; it will be over Fmk 24 billion next year. This includes the so-called project exports, chiefly building projects in Kostamus and Svetogorsk. If we compare this figure to the trade protocol signed a year aog, the growth is over 30 percent. This is explained by the fact that early this year there was an additional round of talks on the balancing of trade. Last year trade with the Soviet Union showed a deficit of over Fmk 2.5 billion for Finland. Ample additional exports have been found. This year trade will not yet be balanced; the deficit for Finland is likely to be around Fmk 1 billion.

With the trade agreement for next year, now initialed in Moscow, the situation may be reversed. According to present prospects trade might next year show a slight surplus for Finland. This depends, however, on the development of oil prices above all. Oil is in Finland's imports--and in the entire Soviet-Finnish trade--the overwhelmingly most decisive factor. According to a statement issued by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the import of oil and other kinds of energy will continue next year in the same way as in the current year. This means that next year too Finland will buy from the Soviet Union about 7 million tons of crude oil, which is two-thirds of the crude oil needed by Finland. In addition Finland will import refined oil products from the Soviet Union: 1.5 million tons each of light and heavy fuel oil. The estimate of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to the effect that trade between the countries might show a surplus for Finland next year sets out from the premise that the prices of oil products will not rise to an unexpectedly high degree during next year. If the rise is very great, trade will certainly not be balanced within a year.

Finland's exports to the Soviet Union next year will continue on the traditional lines. The metal industry is the most important; its share has even slightly strengthened, amounting to half of all exports next year. During this year some really big metal industry deals were concluded between Finland and the Soviet Union; these include special ships, among other things. Thus the metal industry will probably continue to strengthen its positions in Finnish-Soviet trade in the next few years.

Altogether Finnish-Soviet trade next year is sure to maintain its share of Finland's entire foreign trade. In the past few years it has been just under a fifth. The next year will be the first of the next basic 5-year agreement period. Thus the figures indicating a clear growth are promising for the entire 5-year basic agreement period.

NORWAY

INDUSTRY, ENERGY ACCORD WITH SWEDEN DISCUSSED

LD081339 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 27 Nov 80 p 5

[Eivind G. Karlsen report: "Norwegian-Swedish Agreement Before March"]

[Text] Copenhagen, 26 November--Before March next year the Norwegian and Swedish Governments will attempt to draw up the framework for broad cooperation on industry and energy policy between the two countries. After his talks with Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin in Copenhagen today Prime Minister Odvar Nordli stressed that the intention is to make cooperation between Norwegian and Swedish industry easier, no matter what form the agreement might take. Initially Norway is prepared to contribute in the form of long-term oil and gas supplies, but has made the condition that Sweden now specifies fields and projects where its contributions to cooperation would take place. Electricity could also be an element in a cooperation agreement.

As mentioned in our evening edition yesterday, the talks between the Norwegian and Swedish prime ministers took place before all the Scandinavian prime ministers met at Marienborg, north of Copenhagen, with Danish Prime Minister Anker Jorgensen as host.

Prime Minister Nordli announced that the television satellite joint project Nordsat was not discussed by the prime ministers today, but refused to say what had been discussed. However, Nordsat will be raised at Thursday's [28 November] Scandinavian summit in the Danish capital.

As far as the Norwegian-Swedish move is concerned, observers tend to believe that it now depends on Swedish initiatives and concrete proposals whether this bilateral energy and industry cooperation will make important progress. It is not Norway which is putting on the brakes, informed sources told AFTENPOSTEN.

In a briefing for Norwegian journalists after the talks with Prime Minister Falldin, Nordli said, "Norway is prepared to negotiate some form or other of long-term supply agreement as an integral part of broader industry and energy cooperation. The shape and extent of such an agreement will of course be the object of further discussions. Norway is prepared to negotiate a form of authoritative agreement and this could be anything from a declaration from the governments to a more definite agreement," Nordli said. However, the prime minister also said that there is agreement between the two governments about this--and also agreement that this is a link in the intensification of the cooperation between the two countries.

"We in Norway," the prime minister said, "expect Sweden to define the fields and projects considered to be of interest in industrial cooperation and look at the possibility of cooperation on energy policy. Here it is principally a question of oil and gas, especially from Norway," Nordli added. He also announced that electrical power could be part of a package deal.

"Our joint goal is to reach the necessary foundation for the talks the industry ministers are now engaged in, which will be expanded through discussions on an agreement at under secretary level before the Nordic Council's session in Copenhagen in early March," the Norwegian prime minister said.

Nordli also pointed out that the possible future bilateral agreement between Norway and Sweden would not replace but supplement the broad industry and energy cooperation that has been under discussion for a long time. "The Scandinavian prime ministers have agreed to see it in this light," the Norwegian prime minister stated. Prime Minister Nordli denied that Volvo-Beijerinvest's recent Norwegian campaign had given extra impetus to the talks between the Norwegian and Swedish Governments.

However, the prime minister did not rule out that elements in the original Volvo agreement, perhaps especially the moves to remove legal barriers to closer cooperation, could be repeated in the authoritative agreement between the two countries' political authorities.

SIGNIFICANT INCREASE IN NORWEGIAN EXPORTS TO USSR

LD081337 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 26 Nov 80 p 23

[Unattributed report: "Norwegian Exports to Soviet Union Rise 33 Percent"]

[Text] Norwegian exports to the Soviet Union rose by 33 percent in the first 9 months of 1980 and totaled 383 million kroner, Norwegian Export Council figures show.

Part of the increase is due to price rises, but there has still been a significant increase in volume. The NATION newspaper writes: it is principally greater sales of chemicals and paper which account for the increase.

Other European nations, such as Germany and France, have also increased their exports to the Soviet Union this year, even though the United States requested them to limit their exports after the Afghanistan invasion.

OLA ULLSTEN TALKS ABOUT POLAND, ARMED INTERVENTION

LD082058 Stockholm Domestic Service in Swedish 1700 GMT 8 Dec 80

[Text] Swedish Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten said in a speech today that it will again be tested in Poland whether the respect for human freedoms and rights and the sovereignty of nations has any meaning for the leaders of powerful countries when they believe their interests to be threatened. Ullsten also said that a nation's internal unrest and political tensions can never justify an armed intervention.

SWEDEGAS TO STUDY SOVIET GAS IMPORTATION PROJECT

WA081500 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 2 Dec 80 p 25

[Text] Swedegas AB will borrow a further 22 million kronor for, among other purposes, to study how Soviet natural gas can be used in eastern Sweden. The Soviet Union has offered to deliver up to 3 billion cubic meters of natural gas a year beginning at the end of the 1980's. A delegation from Swedegas is traveling to Moscow in a couple of weeks in order to continue discussions on the offer. Since 1977 Swedegas has received state loans totaling 40 million kronor for its work. The only gas project which so far has been decided upon deals with western Scania. The gas for the Scania network is at first to come from the FRG. Swedegas is therefore negotiating with Ruhrgas concerning transport capacity in the so-called Demdan pipe in northern West Germany.

MILLIYET CONDUCTS INTERVIEWS WITH PARTY LEADERS

AKEL's Papaioannou

NC080913 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 4 Dec 80 p 5

[Interview granted by Greek Cypriot Communist Party (AKEL) leader Papaioannou to MILLIYET correspondent Emin Colasan--date and place not given]

[Excerpts] Question: What proportion of votes does your party expect to get in the 1981 elections?
Answer: We imagine that AKEL will emerge as the biggest party.

Question: As AKEL's leader, how do you think the Cyprus dispute should be resolved?
Answer: This dispute must be resolved through peaceful methods. However, an end must be put to imperialist interference in the internal affairs of the island. The Turkish invasion must be terminated and all foreign military forces on the island must be withdrawn. The Greek and Turkish Cypriots have identical interests. We envisage an independent and sovereign Cyprus undivided by borders. It should be federal, nonaligned and demilitarized. If both sides act with good will, it would be possible for the Cyprus question to be resolved within the framework of these principles.

Question: Have you any proposals for the settlement of the Cyprus issue that differ from those of other parties? If you have, what are they?
Answer: The Cyprus issue has two basic aspects: internal and external. The internal aspect requires a settlement through intercommunal talks in accordance with the principles agreed upon between Makarios-Denktas and between Kiprianou-Denktas, and also in accordance with the UN resolutions. The settlement must be a biregional federation. The external aspect of the issue stipulates a settlement to be agreed upon at an international conference under the auspices of the United Nations. At this conference the agreements, which were signed under duress in 1960 for the sake of becoming independent, must be discussed and abrogated. Only thus can Cyprus become truly independent.

Question: What is your party's attitude toward Turkish Cypriots?
Answer: AKEL is the party of the working class. It is therefore the party of the Turkish Cypriot workers as well. Many Turkish Cypriots were members of our party before the Sampson coup and the Turkish invasion.

Question: Do you believe that the two communities can coexist in Cyprus from now on?
Answer: We do not only believe they can, we also maintain that such coexistence serves the vital interests of both communities. The enemies of both communities have incited feelings and sentiments on both sides against the concept "Cypriot nationality" by exploiting the differences between them. These bitter experiences have shown both the Turkish and the Greek Cypriots that they must coexist and cooperate if they wish to lead a happy and prosperous life.

Question: Haven't the Greek and the Greek Cypriot enosis aspirations played a role in provoking the Turkish peace operation?
Answer: The fascist junta coup was exploited by the Turkish Government and the invasion was carried out. The fascist coup and the Turkish invasion are the two faces of the same medallion, and this medallion is imperialism.

Question: Is enosis feasible from now on? Are you opposed to enosis?
Answer: Enosis is no longer on the agenda. As you know, what is now being discussed is independence. Therefore, reverting to enosis does not serve any purpose. We have a different situation now.

Question: It is said that your party no longer supports Kiprianou. Can you state the reasons?
Answer: AKEL has not been in this or in any previous government. We have supported the government in all its positive dealings and criticized it on all its negative actions. It is true that we have withdrawn all our support both from the president and the government, but this is our internal issue and it concerns only our internal affairs.

EDEK's Lissaridhis

NC081118 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 5 Dec 80 p 3

[Interview granted by Dr Lissaridhis, Greek Cypriot EDEK party leader, to MILLIYET correspondent Emin Colasan in Nicosia--date not given]

[Excerpts] Question: What kind of a solution does your party favor for Cyprus?
Answer: We believe that every concession made to the Turkish invasion, which was the outcome of a fait accompli, is a concession made to American imperialism. American imperialism is responsible for the invasion. Concessions to be made under the present circumstances will eventually harm both Turkish and Greek Cypriots. For example, if we accept the formation of federal states with borders, the two communities will eventually unite with their respective fatherlands. I think that this is going to be a concession given not to the Turkish Cypriot community but to American imperialism. It is my sincere belief that the interests of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot workers are identical. We as socialists want an independent Cyprus where--irrespective of different race and religion--the working class will have sovereignty.

Question: You have continually incriminated Turkey. Haven't Greece and the enosis policy somewhat contributed to the Turkish invasion?
Answer: We have opposed every form of fascist attempts irrespective of their origin. We had then and we still have Turkish Cypriot members in our party. I would like to remind you of the fact that the junta and fascism were against Greek Cypriots. Likewise, Turkish Cypriot fascists too were against the Turkish Cypriots. In reality, the action of EOKA-B was directed against the Greek Cypriots and not against the Turkish Cypriots. For example, I was considered more guilty by EOKA-B than the Turkish Cypriots were.

Question: What is your opinion of the enosists?
Answer: When masses are taken into consideration, enosis no longer exists in Cyprus. All parties oppose partition or enosis either with Greece or Turkey. Everybody wants an independent Cyprus. I believe that that is what the Turkish Cypriots want too.

Question: What happens if one day the two communities unite only to see that enosis has risen from the grave, haunting people?
Answer: I do not think this could happen because the people of the island have tasted independence once more. Enosis is now a matter of the past. This is my viewpoint.

Question: Had you been a Turkish Cypriot, how would you have protected yourself against the Sampson coup? We know that this coup was carried out against the Turkish Cypriots and that its aspiration was to bring about enosis. What else could Turkey do under the circumstances?
Answer: This is not true. The coup and the invasion are the twin faces of a game plotted by Kissinger and the CIA. It is extremely interesting that a fascist like Sampson had announced that he would not attack the Turkish Cypriots, and he had not. Moreover, he had made no mention of enosis at all. Invasion was effected only 6 days after the coup. When was this planned, I wonder? Could an invasion be planned and carried out in 6 days? We conclude therefore that the coup and the Turkish invasion were nothing but an action planned by the United States both against the Turkish Cypriots and the Greek Cypriots.

Question: It is said that your party is closely linked with terrorist actions.
Answer: During the period of EOKA-B, we waged a lawful struggle against them. The government had organized a voluntary police force and we were prepared to fight the fascists without any remmeration.

Question: It is being argued that your party is collaborating with secret Armenian organizations which go into action against our diplomats in various countries. Have you any comment?
Answer: Our party is a lawful organization. We are not in collaboration with any armed organization. We are in sympathy with the Armenians because they suffered a massacre. They have a right to think of what happened to their country and nation.

Democratic Rally's Kliridhis

NC090929 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 6 Dec 80 p 5

[Interview granted by Greek Cypriot Democratic Rally Party leader Kliridhis to MILLIYET correspondent Emin Colasan in Nicosia--date not given]

[Excerpt]

Question: What view does your party support regarding the settlement of the Cyprus dispute?
Answer: Cyprus must become an independent, sovereign state. The new constitution to be drafted must stipulate not a confederation but a bicommunal federation. Moreover, Cyprus must have a single legal identity in the international arena. The communities must participate in the federal government in accordance with the principles of equality and righteousness and each community must be able to run its own region in accordance with the federal constitution. Our party wants all the rights and freedoms, secured through international agreements, to be extended to every individual on the island without any discrimination whatsoever.
Question: Does your party have different thoughts on the way the Cyprus dispute should be resolved? If so, then what are the differences?
Answer: Our party favors a settlement within the framework of the four principles outlined in the 1977 Makarios-Denktas agreement. Such a settlement would be in the interests of both communities. We think that the views of the other parties on this subject are a little complicated. They advocate principles such as "long-term struggle" and "internationalizing the issue." Instead of sitting at the negotiating table and discussing the substance of the matter, they are wasting time in discussing the kind of terminology to be used.
Question: Do you believe that the two communities can coexist in peace on the island from now on?
Answer: It is in the interest of both communities to coexist and to benefit from the wealth of the island. Both sides committed serious blunders in the past. Neither Greek Cypriots nor Turkish Cypriots are prepared to leave the island. Therefore, they have no other alternative than to get together and live in mutual respect, harmony and cooperation. I believe that this is the common desire of all the Turks, Greeks, Maronites, Armenians and Catholics living on the island.
Question: Hasn't the wrong Greek Cypriot policy, such as the desire for enosis, contributed to bringing about the Turkish peace operation?
Answer: The responsibility for that part of the Turkish invasion--which was carried out after the Geneva conference--rests entirely on Turkey. The Greek junta had collapsed and Greece had taken a democratic course. Moreover, the government which had come to power after the coup had resigned. What was needed then was not a new invasion but talks. I have said a while ago that both sides have committed blunders. These blunders could have been avoided, had a cease-fire been agreed and negotiations started.
Question: Can enosis emerge again? Are you in favor of enosis with Greece?
Answer: A settlement of the Cyprus dispute is possible only if it is based on the principles of independence, sovereignty and bicommunality. This is the only realistic approach. Both the Greek and Turkish Cypriots would like to preserve their national characteristics as well as their religion, language and culture. But this should not prevent them from cooperating in the interest of their homeland. I am against any solution which neither side cannot accept of their own free will. For such a settlement would lead to new disputes which would destroy the state and bring about a double enosis.
Question: What kind of guarantees do you think should be given to the Turkish Cypriots so that they can agree to coexist with you?
Answer: The best guarantee would be the desire of both communities to live in an independent, sovereign and bicommunal federation. However, we acknowledge the fact that the Turkish Cypriots should be given more extensive guarantees.

AKEL PLENUM STATEMENT ON FUTURE ELECTIONS

[Text] The AKEL Central Committee and the Central Control Committee met in plenum on 5 December 1980, under the chairmanship of secretary general E.Papaioannou, and studied a Political Bureau document to be submitted to the pan-Cypriot organizational conference to be held on 15 February 1981. The report was presented on behalf of the Political Bureau by Dinos Konstandinou, the party's central organizing secretary. Following a discussion, the plenum approved the document and noted the following:

"1. The organizational policy that has been followed, and is still being followed by the party, is correct and appropriate for Cypriot conditions for it meets and serves the needs of the party's political line and tactics.
"2. Thanks to the sound policy and active role that it is playing in the struggle for the salvation of Cyprus and the solution of the people's problems, AKEL has further increased its power among and influence on all strata of people, particularly the working class. Within 2 years time and despite the imperialist and reactionary attacks, 1,500 new members have joined its ranks; there was further qualitative improvement in all steps of the party machinery; fresh partisan teams have been established and have been functioning in [city] quarters, places of work, refugee settlements and in villages.
"3. Collective leadership, the democratic way of discussion and of decision-making are characteristic qualities of the operation of all the party organizations and of its guiding bodies. The party's collective leadership, solid unity and monolithism constitute an unshakeable rock that breaks and crushes all the attacks, slanders, plots, and machinations by the miscellaneous enemies of the party and the people's movement.
"4. The pan-Cypriot organizational conference will be a new milestone and a fresh starting point for the further development and qualitative elevation of the party and its expansion in every place of work, in every [city] quarter, in every refugee settlement, and in every village of Cyprus. The solution of basic organizational problems will further strengthen the party and will make it capable of responding better to the serious political, economic, social and other problems facing the working people and the country in general.
"5. The AKEL Central Committee and Central Control Committee call upon the members and cadres to actively work to overfulfill all the duties which have been set in honor of the pan-Cypriot organizational conference.
"6. AKEL, being a consistent party, a party of deeds, continues to be the main political force in the country; it is playing a decisive role in our people's struggle for the solution of the Cyprus problem and of the working people's economic and social problems. All the conquests of the working people and of their professional organizaions are linked with AKEL's broad, consistent and patriotic policy and action. Our party will continue to contribute to the further development of the struggles by the people's movement. At the same time it will contribute, with all of its powers, to safeguarding the people's conquests, to repulsing the employers' attacks against the working people's conquests—such as the salary readjustments based on the cost of living index and the elevation of their standard of living and culture.
"7. AKEL is ideologically, politically and organizationally fully prepared to successfully wage the battle in the forthcoming parliamentary elections in order to bring about, after the elections, a qualitative political change in cooperation with other democratic forces.
"8. The AKEL Central Committee and Central Control Committee call upon all the party members and cadres to continue--in a planned, organized and determined way and with optimism--their work toward the fulfillment of the basic goals which the party has fixed for the coming parliamentary elections. They call upon the party cadres and members, the friends and supporters of the party and of the people's movement to work with enthusiasm and determination for a magnificent victory of the party during the coming parliamentary elections, with the main goals:

"AKEL to be the number one party in the house!
"No to the Rally Party, the party of the extreme right wing, of the coupists and of the reactionary economic oligarchy!
"Forward to work for victory!"

PASOK, KKE CRITICIZED FOR LEAVING CHAMBER DEBATE

AT091325 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 9 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] A severe attack was launched yesterday by the smaller opposition parties against PASOK and the KKE. The cause of the attack was the walkout staged by the two larger opposition parties from the debate on the bill dealing with "Greek representation at the EEC" because they disagreed with the government's proposal that the bill should be ratified under an "urgent" classification, in other words within 6 hours.

EDA Chairman Ilias Iliou described the walkout by PASOK and the KKE as unacceptable because, as he stated, "it is an unacceptable tactical move to walk out of the Chamber of Deputies whenever we disagree instead of remaining in order to fight for our views." Referring to PASOK, Iliou added, "It should not be possible for large and strong parties which claim authority to walk out of the Chamber of Deputies because when the mandate is entrusted to them they will be subjected to the same treatment and tactics."

Panayiotis Kanellopoulos said the walkout of the two parties is an act of which he cannot approve because the bill does not deal with controversial issues.

K. Bandouvas of EDIK remained in the Chamber of Deputies despite his disagreement over the process of classifying the bill as "urgent" because, he said, "deputies must wage their battles within the Chamber of Deputies."

Mrs Virginia Tsoudherou of KODISO said she also has her objections to the "urgency" but will remain in the chamber debate "because the position of the deputy is within this Chamber."

L. Kirkos of the KKE-Interior said he emphatically disagreed with the classification of the bill as "urgent" and that he could also walk out for reasons of democratic solidarity. He explained, however, he would not walk out because "it is other parties which ignored the fact that there are others in the opposition who also object to the bill and they hastened to walk out ignoring this very same democratic solidarity."

Foreign Minister Mitsotakis stated the government has every right to introduce a bill under the "urgent" classification according to article 76, paragraph 4 of the constitution. He added it is essential to have the bill ratified because tomorrow he would have to depart for overseas. Answering PASOK's walkout he added, "we cannot accept that an opposition party should place itself above the constitution thus denying a constitutional provision."

ELEVTHEROTIPIA: U.S. BASES SIGNING DELAYED

AT081410 Athens ELEVTHEROTIPIA in Greek 8 Dec 80 p 16

[Reportage by SP. Karatzaferis: "Signing of the Base Agreement Is Being Delayed"]

[Excerpts] The signing of the Greek-U.S. agreement on bases will be delayed because many obstacles have arisen, as revealed by a Greek source and as admitted by a U.S. official who told a Greek colleague that "in any case it would be good if the agreement were signed before 20 January when Reagan takes over."

According to existing reports, the following factors prevent the signing of the agreement on U.S. bases:

1. Greece is asking the Americans to make available to it the six "secret" appendices of the U.S.-Turkish agreement which, according to information available to the Greek side, refer to additional economic aid to Turkey and provide details of joint command over the bases. The same reports state that the Turks exercise virtual command over U.S. bases in Turkey.

2. The plan of U.S. Ambassador McCloskey was rejected by the Greek Government because it incorporated conditions which were far worse than those agreed upon under the initialled 1977 Greek-U.S. agreement. For example, the initialled agreement provided that the Greek commander would be able to visit all confidential sections of the U.S. bases accompanied by his U.S. colleague without advance warning. This included the audio-listening sections of the bases at Iraklion, Nea Makri and Eilinikon. The McCloskey plan proposes that the Greek commander will be able to enter the "confidential" sections after a 24-hour advance warning and that he should also explain the reasons for his visit.

3. The Americans demonstrate no "good will" toward a solution by Greek-Turkish differences and they pressure Greece to give in on control over Aegean airspace under the excuse that this is "to the benefit of the alliance." It is reported that the U.S. position on this was underlined at the recent meeting of the Supreme Armed Forces Council (ASFA) and that it was resolved there should be "no giving in."

Always according to the same reports the Greek side rejected the McCloskey plan as unacceptable and the counterproposal which it is preparing (to be ready by Monday, 15 December), asks among other things which are "more than what is provided in the 1977 agreement," for: fundamental joint command over U.S. bases and the 200 "confidential" departments (described as "zoos"); that the Greek commander should not only be able to enter these departments freely and without advance warning, but that Greek technicians should also be employed in them. The line of thinking behind the Greek proposal is that since the bases fall within the framework of NATO and since we have now also reintegrated within the alliance, there is no reason why Greek specialists should not be part of the electronic information sections.

If we take into consideration U.S. reaction in 1977, when they did not at first want the Greek commander to even enter the "secret" sections, one can easily anticipate the reception which the Americans will give to the Greek proposal.

A government source, when questioned yesterday on the report of the pro-government "I KATHIMERINI" on the bases, stated: "No plan has been submitted and no plan has been prepared. Negotiations are being conducted at a lower level."

Defense Minister Averof is today attending the conference of defense ministers of the European NATO member states, and on Tuesday and Wednesday he will attend the NATO defense planning conference. Until now the Greek defense minister did not attend these conferences.

At the same time, the Military Committee is also due to meet today at the level of chiefs of staff of NATO member states and General Gratsios will attend on behalf of Greece. The NATO foreign ministers conference is due to meet in Brussels on Thursday and Friday, and Foreign Minister Mitsotakis will be attending it.

COUNCIL APPROVES BLACK SEA BORDER WITH USSR

VOTCP ON ADVANTAGES OF SOVIET ECONOMIC AID

TA070948 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 7 Dec 80

[Station commentary: "Soviet Help Contributes to the Reduction of Turkey's Dependence on Imperialism"]

[Text] A Soviet heavy industry delegation recently completed its talks in Ankara. A new economic protocol was signed between the two countries. Under the protocol, which complements the agreement signed between the two countries in 1978, the production capacity of the Iskenderun iron and steel mill will be doubled. The Soviet Union will extend the financial, technical and technological aid necessary to increase iron and steel production in our country.

The Turkish and Soviet delegations also discussed ways of increasing the production capacity of the Seydisehir aluminum factory.

This kind of real help from the Soviet Union--our friend in need--is not something new. The Soviet Union, which fully supported our national liberation war against imperialism, made the greatest contribution to the establishment of our economy after we had won our national liberation. For example, the Kayseri and Nazilli weaving combines, which form the basis of our textile industry, were built with the financial and technical aid supplied by the Soviet Union. Soviet help did not stop there. It continued with several investments which are key installations in our country's industry. The Seydisehir aluminum factory, the Aliaga oil refinery, the Iskenderun iron and steel mill, the Artvin chipboard factory, the Cayirova glass factory, the Bandirma sulphuric acid factory--all these were built thanks to the real help of the Soviet Union.

What is the nature of this real help. First, it has a positive effect on Turkey's foreign trade situation, which is stagnant. For example, while the imperialist countries place limitations on our tradional agricultural or agriculture-based exports, in our relations with the Soviet Union, we pay for their investments in our country with these agricultural products. Second, almost all of the Soviet investments are heavy industry investments. Such investments reduce our country's dependence on others. Third, the Soviet Union's heavy industry investments in our country solve the unemployment problem by creating hundreds of thousands of jobs. Fourth, such investments make a great contribution by training technical cadres and skilled labor greatly needed by the Turkish economy. Fifth, the Soviet investments are made with the most convenient credit conditions and the most convenient patent and license agreements. Sixth, none of this aid posits political conditions, nor makes enslaving economic or political demands.

In short, Soviet aid and the other socialist countries' aid help reduce our country's dependence on imperialism.

Compare the two kinds of aid: On the one hand the so-called aid and the so-called credits being extended by the IMF and the other imperialist financial establishments and centers—aid and credits that enslave the country and destroy the economy; and on the other hand, help from the Soviet Union and other socialist countries which is based on the principle of mutual interest and which contributes to the improvement of the country's economy.

MINISTER OZAL COMMENTS ON TRADE TALKS WITH LIBYA

TA091607 Ankara ANATOLIA in English 1505 GMT 9 Dec 80

[Text] Ankara, 9 Dec (AA)—Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal said talks with a Libyan trade mission currently in Ankara would cover the fields of technical cooperation, petroleum, transport and communications and construction engineering. In a statement to an Ankara paper, Ozal noted the talks with the visiting delegation, headed by Libya's economy minister, would constitute the session of a joint committee on economic cooperation set up by the two countries.

With regard to imports of Libyan oil in particular, Ozal noted the annual amount had originally been set at 4 million tons, but had later been reduced to 2 million tons. He believed current relations between the two countries could be improved even further through negotiations.

DEFENSE MINISTER ON NATO COMMITTEE MEETING

[Excerpt] Can Okaner and Selma Berksoy report from Brussels that the NATO defense ministers met today before the NATO Defense Planning Committee meetings to be held tomorrow and exchanged views on technical matters as well as international issues. The developments during the last 6 months and the effects of these developments on the treaty organization were examined. The defense ministers reached an agreement on the view that NATO's military capability must be increased to bolster its deterrence in the face of the increasing military power of the Warsaw Pact. The continuing Soviet invasion of Afghanistan was also taken up during the meeting.

In a statement following the meeting, Defense Minister Umit Haluk Bayulken said: It must be noted with regret that developments in the international field since our last meeting in May have not been encouraging. In the event that incidents continue to develop this way, efforts for detente are bound to suffer. Our desire, as Turkey, is the prevention of such negative developments and the strengthening and the prevalence of a genuine climate of detente.

FOREIGN MINISTER 'GREATLY WORRIED' OVER POLAND

[Text] London--At the end of his 2-day visit to Great Britain, Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr declared in London on Friday that he did not believe that one could reasonably continue the Madrid CSCE followup conference in the event of an invasion of Poland by the Warsaw Pact countries. "It is very difficult to hold a conference on detente when there is no chance for detente," Pahr declared, adding that he was "greatly worried" over the current situation in Poland. The Polish people should solve their problems themselves without outside interference, he said. During his meeting with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington, Pahr had discussed primarily East-West relations and the planned North-South conference to be held next year in Mexico.

COMMUNIST PARTY HOLDS 24TH PARTY CONGRESS

Accountability Report

AU100928 [Editorial Report] Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German on 7 December carries on page 1 a report on the opening of the 24th party congress of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe] in Vienna on 6 December; on page 3 an account of the opening speech delivered by Politburo member Erwin Scharf, secretary of the KPOe Central Committee; on pages 3-4 a report on discussion speeches by KPOe functionaries and some foreign guest delegates, a summary of the speech by CPSU delegation head M.V. Zimyanin, secretary of the CPSU Central Committee; and, in a special supplement, the 25,000-word KPOe Central Committee accountability report delivered by party Chairman Franz Muhri.

Muhri's report, which reflects full loyalty to the ideological and political positions of the CPSU and the Soviet Union, contains the following passage on Poland: "Comrades, the fact that in socialism there is no automatic guarantee against mistakes in the economy, red tape and violations of democracy has been demonstrated once more by the latest developments in Poland.

"In evaluating the events in Poland, we proceed from the premise that the difficulties in supply and other negative phenomena are not due to causes that are inherent in socialism, as is asserted by anticommunist propaganda, but that the actual causes are rooted in a number of objective factors and, primarily, in subjective mistakes by the party and government. We are in solidarity with the endeavors of the Polish comrades to find a positive political way out, based on correcting the mistakes, on the further all-round development of the socialist society, and on the necessary intensified and consistent struggle against the antisocialist counterrevolutionary forces seeking to prevent such a positive solution. We are of the opinion that in this way the Polish Communists and working people can resolve their difficulties and problems themselves.

"That is why we resolutely reject the attitude of those political forces and media in Austria who are oriented toward an exacerbation of the situation in Poland, for whom there cannot be enough strikes and wage demands in Poland, while they hold the opposite view on strikes and wage demands in Austria.

"A positive way out lies in the interest of the Polish people who, through the path of the socialist revolution and alliance within the framework of the Warsaw Pact as well as the cooperation within the framework of CEMA, have not only achieved substantial economic, social, democratic and cultural progress and accomplishments but who have also been able, for the first time in Polish history, to lastingly ensure their independent national existence. A positive way out in Poland also lies in the interest of peace and detente in Europe. Such a way out also lies in Austria's interest."

Muhri's report mentions Afghanistan only briefly--when claiming that the United States and NATO have taken steps to intensify armament "even before the Soviet Union rendered military aid to the national-democratic revolution in Afghanistan." In this context there is the following reference to President-elect Reagan: "It was the new U.S. president who declared that the United States intends to further step up its armament and to seek military superiority."

The report stresses the KPOe's solidarity with the international workers movement, affinity with the world communist movement, and support of strengthening and consolidating the unity and cohesion among the communist parties on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, equal rights and noninterference in internal affairs. It says in this context: "Every party independently determines its policy. Therefore, there cannot be any claim to leadership, any leading center in the world communist movement. We are for the development of bilateral regional contacts and relations, and for a world conference of communist and workers parties which must be well prepared and should be held when the overwhelming majority of parties want it.

"Proceeding from these positions we resolutely reject the anti-Soviet and anticommunist position of the Chinese leadership. The Chinese leadership has increasingly adopted a course of unprincipled political, economic and military collaboration with imperialism, with the reactionary forces and fascist dictatorships, whereby China is aiding the opponents of detente. At the same time, we support the Soviet Union's endeavors to improve relations with the PRC. We hold on to the possibility of the prospect of China's coming around to adopting a road that leads to the establishment of a new unity. That would be one of the greatest defeats of imperialism and world reaction."

In its extensive outline of domestic policy aspects, the report calls for intensified political work at enterprises, intensified struggle for implementing an antimonopolist economic policy, tax reforms for the benefit of the working people, unity of action in struggling for the implementation of economic and political demands and especially in the struggle against neofascism. It criticizes Austria's economic ties with the EC, the role of nationalized banks and the "social partnership" system supported by the three other political parties in Austria. In conclusion, the report pleads for the establishment of an Austrian social system, a "socialism in Austrian colors." "What we mean is that the generally valid principles and characteristics of socialism must be creatively applied to the conditions in our country, that they can be implemented only in a national fasion. There is no generally valid model of socialism--neither a Soviet nor a 'Eurocommunist' model."

Conclusion of Congress

AU101514 [Editorial Report] Vienna VOLKSSTIMME in German on 10 December carries on page 1 a report on the conclusion of the 24th Congress of the Austrian Communist Party [KPOe] on 8 December, "after 2 and 1/2 days of intensive work." The paper notes that the Central Committee's accountability report was unanimously approved and that Franz Muhri was unanimously reelected party chairman. In a separate report on page 2, the paper carries a complete list of the new Central Committee and Politburo members as well as Control Commission and Arbitration Commission members. While not giving the names of outgoing members of these party bodies, the paper notes that Muhri thanked the "outgoing Central Committee members" and stresses his remark that "there is not a single one among them who quit for political reasons, which is another indication of the party's stability."

Vienna WIENER ZEITUNG in German on 10 December says in its brief report, on page 2, on the KPOe Congress that Josef Progsch and Karl Zenker--whose names appear on VOLKSSTIMME's list of members of the new Central Committee--have not been reelected Politburo members.

According to the VOLKSSTIMME report, the new Politburo members are Michael Graber, Franz Hager, Anton Hofer, Hans Kalt, Franz Karger, Gustav Loistl, Franz Muhri, Karl Reiter, Erwin Scharf, Irma Schwager, Walter Silbermayr, and Ernst Wimmer. Erwin Scharf was reelected as Central Committee secretary, Hans Kalt as VOLKSSTIMME chief editor and Otto Janecek as deputy chief editor.

VOLKSSTIMME carries on page 2 a party congress resolution: "Fight Fascism" on growing neofascist activities in Austria. The resolution stresses the Austrian Communists constant struggle against Nazi fascism in the past and their determination to make every effort to prevent this dange from growing again. It calls for compliance with the pertinent state treaty stipulations, for "the ban of fascist organizations and publications and the unrestricted application of the constitutional laws." On page 8, VOLKSSTIMME carries excerpts from party congress resolutions on "Solidarity With the Struggle of the Peoples of Uruguay, El Salvador and South Korea."

The WIENER ZEITUNG 10 December report says that the party congress also adopted an "extensive political resolution" which, in the field of foreign policy, stresses the need for continuation of the policy of detente. In the domestic policy sector, calls for the establishment of a strong antifascist front together with all democratic forces in the country, and in the economic sector, calls for a shortening of the work week and a higher share for the working people in the redistribution of the national income.

VOLKSSTIMME on 10 December carries an account of discussion speeches by KPOe functionaries and guest delegates from fraternal parties, including a summary of the speech delivered by SED Politiburo member Konrad Naumann. On page 1, VOLKSSTIMME carries a brief report on meetings between representatives of 13 fraternal party delegations to the KPOe Congress and KPOe functionaries including Party Chairman Franz Muhri and Central Committee Secretary Erwin Scharf. It says in part: "Opinions and information on questions of mutual interest were exchanged and the close solidarity between the KPOe and these fraternal parties was reaffirmed. At all talks the sides stressed the great importance of intensified efforts in the struggle for preserving and continuing the international process of detente, for disarmament and peace.

"In his talks with delegations of the fraternal parties from the socialist countries, party Chairman Franz Muhri also emphasized the importance of the development of economic relations with Austria.

"The representatives of the fraternal parties reaffirmed their solidarity with the KPOe and commented favorably on, and expressed satisfaction with, the successful implementation of the 24th party congress. They wished the Austrian Communists success in fulfilling the tasks and goals set by the congress."

NOTHOMB DISCUSSES USSR-POLAND, U.S. WITH ITO

[Text] Brussels Dec 10 KYODO--Belgian Foreign Minister Charles-Fredinand Nothomb told his Japanese counterpart Masayoshi Ito here Wednesday that the Soviet Union may make all possible efforts to avoid a "too costly" military intervention in Poland.

Meeting with Ito, who arrived here earlier in the day as part of his current tour of west European countries, Nothomb said the Soviet Union has had the experience of having to pay a "high cost" for its earlier invasion of Afghanistan. The Soviet Union is likely to try to avoid military intervention in Poland which would "cost Moscow even more," the Belgian foreign minister was quoted as telling Ito. Touching on his trip to Poland earlier this month, Nothomb was understood to have further told Ito that the Polish leaders told him they had full support from the people and the political situation was under their control. The possibility of Soviet military intervention in Poland will thus hinge on how well the leaders manage to control the political situation and achieve economic recovery, Nothomb said.

Referring to the current trade problems between Japan and west European countries, the Belgian foreign minister said he believed talks should be continued in the future to solve the problems by increasing European exports to Japan.

Ito agreed that such talks, particularly on political aspects, should be promoted to keep trade problems from developing into political issues.

Asked by Nothomb to comment on the incoming U.S. administration of Ronald Reagan, Ito told him that Reagan, who advocates use of force to maintain peace and the sharing of responsibility among allies, will show a different approach to relations with the Soviet Union and strengthening of the defense for the western world from that of Jimmy Carter.

UK, DUTCH MINISTERS DISCUSS POLAND, OTHER TOPICS

LD101113 Rotterdam NRC HANDELSBLAD in Dutch 6 Dec 80 p 2

[Excerpt] The Hague, 6 December--"There can be no doubt remaining in Russia or in any of the Eastern European nations about the seriousness of the consequences in the event of an intervention in Poland. After the statements on the matter from the United States and from the European leaders in Luxembourg a period of reflection has now, I hope, begun which will lead to a consolidation of the situation in Poland by the Poles themselves; it is their affair."

British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington made this statement yesterday afternoon after a 2 and 1/2 hour meeting with his Netherlands counterpart Christoph van der Klaauw, at which they discussed bilateral problems and EEC affairs. Neither of the two ministers would say anything to the press about possible future sanctions in the event of Russian intervention in Poland. Van der Klaauw said that it would be premature to threaten sanctions now. Carrington said that if and when developments had gone that far, the matter would have to be handed over to the chairman of the EEC Council of Ministers, who would then have to call a meeting of his colleagues to discuss the matter.

Minister van der Klaauw, who will take over the chairmanship of the Council of Ministers on 1 January for 6 months, expressed the hope that the 10 EEC partners will have reached an agreement on the restructuring of the EEC budget by the end of June 1981, the biggest problem in the coming period. His British counterpart said that this problem would remain throughout both chairmanships (the Dutch and the British, which follows immediately after).

The two foreign ministers described the preparation of a European initiative in the Middle East as the second most important problem.

GOVERNMENT URGES EARLY EC FOOD AID TO POLAND

LD101636 Hamburg DPA in German 1617 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Text] Bonn, 10 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Government has stressed its interest in the early provision of the food aid promised by the European Community to Poland. After today's Federal Cabinet meeting Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling said that the government assumes, in line with the statement by the EC heads of government at Luxembourg, that the Community will take early decisions on the aid scheme. The Federal Government will arrange for credit guarantees to help provide the necessary credit terms for Poland.

Boelling said that the Community has yet to set the order of magnitude of its aid program, but things are moving ahead. It is not yet clear whether Poland will receive the foodstuffs at world market prices or on more favorable terms.

According to Boelling, Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt stressed that the Federal Government, while observing strict restraint in its assessment of Polish events, has tried to provide economic aid to Poland to meet Warsaw's requests. Boelling referred to the recent DM1.2 billion credits granted by German banks to Poland which the chancellor and his foreign minister strongly supported, and for which a federal credit guarantee for DM600 million was provided.

GENSCHER ON EUROPEAN ROLE IN EAST-WEST BALANCE

[Article signed WS: "Bonn Warns of Political Dissociation of Western Europe From the United States"]

[Text] Berlin, 9 December--Federal Foreign Minister Genscher in Berlin has warned of the illusion that Europe might assume a position between the United States and the Soviet Union, nor could there be any special role between East and West for the Federal Republic. The United States and Europe together constitute the West, and the Federal Republic is part of the West. But there is a special German responsibility for peace and cooperation in Europe. The readiness to assume responsibility does not, however, mean for the Federal Republic a temptation to venture international solo actions.

"I also warn of the illusion that the inter-German relationship could be preserved as a sort of fine-weather zone if the East-West relations end up in an adverse weather zone. Anyone trying to do that nevertheless would lead our country into dangerous dependencies and ultimately into isolation," Genscher said at the traditional annual dinner of the Berlin Press Conference. And yet, there is no call for resignation. Rather the will for cooperation must be put up against delimitation, also and particularly at this time when setbacks have occurred in inter-German relations. "We on our part will do everything to prevent additional disturbances in the overall East-West climate from emanating from inter-German relations."

The foundation of German foreign policy is the Federal Republic's incorporation in the European Community and in the North Atlantic alliance. This is why keeping the two communities strong and further developing them must have priority in German foreign policy. The development of East-West relations has newly posed the question concerning the sense in, and the future of, cooperation between East and West, the foreign minister said. But in discussing detente policy it is necessary first to analyze soberly what detente policy can accomplish and what it cannot. Thus, detente policy does not promise the elimination of fundamental contradictions in the concepts of values between West and East. It does not even promise any straight and free progress devoid of any setbacks. But most of all it does not represent any substitute for the will of one's own defense, rather making the latter the prerequisite for itself.

Balance is an inalienable precondition for any realistic detente policy. The European allies will be able to live up to their responsibility for the common interest only if they do not consider the efforts toward ensuring and--where necessary--restoring the balance a matter concerning the United States to which they need not contribute anything. The North Atlantic alliance must not be mistaken for a watchman's service for Europe.

On the threshold of the eighties the topic of medium-range weapons becomes the key question of whether it will be possible to create a balance on a lower level--through disarmament or whether a higher balance will ensue--an arms race--or whether Western European will embark on the road of security-political dissociation from the United States by tolerating a growing superiority of the eastern side. The determination of the West to implement without any restriction both parts of the Brussels decision on the arms gap closure--no acceptance of the superiority of the other side and the determination to attain a balance on as low a level as possible through negotiations--demonstrates the will to do everything to ensure balance and to avoid another arms race.

"For this reason any doubt entertained in the West about the determination to establish a balance spells an aggravation rather than an alleviation of the disarmament efforts because it nurses hopes in the East that a state of accepted superiority for it may ensue." A Western policy unequivocally aimed at ensuring balance, not leaving any doubt that it will not accept any Soviet superiority, making it clear also to its own public that the aspiration to superiority always is offensive in its effects--such a policy alone stands for actively safeguarding peace and ensures the bases for arms control and disarmament without any risk to the West's own security.

Genscher termed it "a considerable gain" that the debate on the government statement in the Bundestag has resulted in new prospects for cooperation between the government and the opposition. What is now taking shape must be neither debated to death nor sacrificed to cheap dogmatism or a cheap triumph; it needs to be gently cultivated and developed. He as the foreign minister proposes to contribute to this end, he said.

COMMENTATOR ON WESTERN NAVAL COOPERATION WITH U.S.

[Adelbert Weinstein article]

[Text] Honolulu, in December--The U.S. Pacific fleet is looking for allies. The strategic concentration in the Indian Ocean is tying down considerable forces of the U.S. Navy. The core of the naval unit cruising in the Persian Gulf is represented by the U.S. 7th Fleet. It can fulfill its mission only because it has less ships in its actual area of operation, the wet triangle between Hawaii, Japan and the Philippines. In addition, the commander in chief borrows units. They come from the 6th Fleet in the Mediterranean and the 2nd in the Atlantic. Both fleets are elements of NATO's strategic security system. The Atlantic alliance is thus indirectly involved in the defense of the Middle East.

This reshuffling of burdens in their own armed forces, however, is not producing any relief for the navy. The United States is therefore looking for help. It expects the help to come from its partners. Immediate support from NATO friends is not counted upon. The Pacific headquarters knows about the difficulties of the alliance in setting up a so-called "second front" in the strategic Mideast zone. In agreement with Washington, no commander therefore is insisting on setting up a new and extended naval alliance, but close cooperation with those Western naval forces whose units operate along the east coast of Africa and in the Indian Ocean is being looked for. Without having common headquarters in mind, America tries to coordinate its naval actions in the Indian Ocean with the Atlantic allies. This method of maritime cooperation is considered more effective than the setting up of multinational Mideastern headquarters.

Since navy people usually understand each other, a supranational strategy has been developed in practice in the Indian Ocean. There is such a thing as "western initiative", Western meaning more than merely Atlantic. Applied to maritime cooperation, the term includes such industrial nations as Japan, Australia and New Zealand.

Japan supplies the infrastructure of strategic concentration in the Indian Ocean. Australia and New Zealand are involved more or less actively. Australia particularly considers itself a Pacific state. Its interests reach far into the Indian Ocean. The Australian Defense Ministry draws the operational line of their own fleet along the African Continent. The Fraser government supports the establishment of a supranational naval force in the Indian Ocean. The Australian shipbuilding program envisages for that purpose the production of about a dozen bigger surface ships and an aircraft carrier. In western Australia electronic centers are located which help the Americans to coordinate strategic submarine action. Since the Australian Air Force flies the F-111 type long-range fighter-bomber, the pilots are interested in developing the landing strips on Diego Garcia.

This island, the steppingstone and turning point of American Naval Forces in the Indian Ocean, is of significance as an advanced basis for the Australian home defense. Diego Garcia in the long run is of strategic importance as a supply basis for the Australian Navy. It means that cooperation with America offers itself in the maritime area between India, the Arab coast and eastern Africa. It corresponds to the Atlantic tradition of defending its own continent from far advanced positions. New Zealand, the neighbor, can contribute less to the common defense, but as regards its strategic thinking, it follows the Australian model almost every time. The Pacific command in Honolulu can count on both nations in an exceptional case.

The British presence in the Indian Ocean is of military value for the moves of the American Pacific Command in the Persian Gulf. The British presence is of additional political advantage. First, the British can exploit their long Mideastern experience. Second, London can act more flexibly in the Arab Emirates than the United States. The restraint with which the British act vis-a-vis Israel helps them to deal with the Arabs.

But the British military presence in the Indian Ocean is not overwhelming. The British fleet, however, regularly holds naval maneuvers in these areas. A helicopter carrier is then dispatched, escorted by five to six frigates and tenders. The British are also represented on Diego Garcia. These are helps that do not cause special attention and that are not stressed by London, but they help the Pacific Command to carry out the strategic mission. The British presence in "peacetime" is a guarantee that English help will be effective in case of tension.

The Pacific Command will be able in a critical situation to include the navy of the Netherlands in its plannings. The Netherlands is making just a modest contribution, but this old seafaring nation for a very long time cruised the waters where the U.S. Navy operates at present.

The Netherlands dispatches a combat unit every 2 years to the Indian Ocean. Since its officers and men are trained according to the British model, usually staying in British ports for training purposes prior to setting out for the great voyage, the U.S. Navy has no difficulties cooperating with them. Naval action by the Netherlands in support of the action of the big ally would have a psychological effect--on both the Atlantic alliance and the Americans at home.

Eventually there are also the French. With 26 units France has the second biggest naval presence in the Indian Ocean, after the Americans. Everybody in the alliance knows how much France insists on its independence in the alliance. The French pursue an individual Mideast policy. Direct cooperation with the Pacific Command in nonwar times is unimaginable.

But, on the other hand, no doubts exist that President Giscard, like De Gaulle, would act if the world situation called for direct support of the American ally in the Indian Ocean. The general was the first to assist America when Khrushchev began his Cuban adventure.

So the United States does not stand fully alone in the Indian Ocean. There is no spectacular or demonstrative support of the partners, but an allies "fleet in being" keeps in the background. This concealed concentration is undoubtedly also a regional NATO contribution to safeguarding the energy resources.

PAPERS ON NATO CONFERENCE CONCERNING POLAND

[Press review on NATO defense ministers meeting in Brussels]

[Text] BERLINER MORGENPOST deals with the meeting of the Western defense minister in Brussels: NATO, whose winter conference this year is taking place under the depressing shadow of the crisis surrounding Poland, is acting differently than Soviet cartoons prefer to show. It is not rattling sabres, nor is it fanning the fire. This would be at odds not only with the military realities in Eastern Europe but also with the defensive character of this protective alliance of free nations. Still, the alliance is not standing idly by; it is illustrating for Moscow's benefit the consequences of an invasion of Poland, and it is drawing conclusions. These include the strengthening of its own deterrence capability.

WESTDEUTSCHE ALLEGEMEINE ZEITUNG notes: NATO was well advised to tone down a bit the sensation which its generals had caused by their critical assessment of the situation and by the precautionary measures that were announced publicly. As advisable as it may be to make it clear to Moscow that the West sees through this game, it is just as dangerous to further aggravate the situation with alarming reports and to cause unnecessary anxiety in one's own camp. Defense Minister Apel seems to have made no bones about that.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE EXAMINES BREZHNEV PROPOSAL

[Commentary signed NT.: "Helsinki on the Gulf"]

[Text] The Soviet leadership is unequalled in its persistence. Time and again it reverts to its old ideas. The proposals advanced by Brezhnev in New Delhi to map out a peace and security doctrine for the Gulf region were mentioned early this year in a TASS commentary. What was found to be hardly worth anything at that time does not become any better just because it is advanced once again by the Soviet head of state and party during a visit to India. Is this perhaps the revival of the old Soviet wishful thinking about a collective security pact for Asia? Helsinki on the Gulf? This will probably come to naught. The experiences with the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) are not encouraging. Besides, any talks about a Gulf doctrine are inconceivable as long as the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan continues. In that respect Brezhnev did not say anything new in Delhi. On the contrary, the Soviet attitude on the Afghanistan issue has hardened. The Indian Government, too, could not but take note of this with disapproval. Prime Minister Indira Gandhi called Brezhnev a reliable friend, to be sure, yet this must not mean too much. Indian needs aside, there are some friends whom one prefers to see leave than to arrive.

QATAR TO BUY FIGHTERS; EGYPT NEGOTIATIONS REPORTED

[Text] Qatar, one of the Gulf sultanates, has just signed a contract with France for the purchase of 14 Mirage F-1 fighter aircraft. This emirate, which has long been an outlet for British suppliers, has chosen the private Dassault-Breguet group's interceptor to modernize its air defense.

Qatar is the fifth client to buy the Mirage F-1 in this region of the world, following Libya (38 aircraft), Kuwait (20), Jordan (36) and Iraq which ordered a total of 60 aircraft in two separate contracts in 1977 and 1979. Other Gulf countries have bought Mirage-III aircarft. Qatar is the 11th client for the Mirage F-1 of which 650 models have so far been sold in the world, including to France.

Qatar has therefore concluded two major military agreements with France in the space of a few weeks. In September the emirate ordered three fast missile-launching patrol ships and has put capital into setting up a coastal defense system against enemy ships based on mobile batteries of MM-40 missiles. At the end of November Qatar opted for a squadron of Mirage F-1 aircraft, in other words a total of 14 aircraft, and entrusted the training of its experts--navigators, mechanics, electricians and ground controllers--to France.

At the end of last year Qatar bought six Alpha-jet twin-jet training and light ground support aircarft, becoming the first Near East state to order such an aircraft. Since then we have learned that Egypt has concluded an agreement in principle, whose details are at a very advanced stage of negotiation, to purchase some 30 Alpha-jet aircraft.

LE MONDE ON POSSIBLE ARMS DEALS WITH GULF STATES

[Jacques Isnard article: "A 'Profiteer' in the Gulf?"]

[Text] It was expected to be Abu Dhabi or Kuwait but it is Qatar which has just concluded its order for French military equipment before the two other Gulf states which have nonetheless been engaged in preliminary negotiations with the French authorities and industrialists for several months--almost 2 years in Abu Dhabi's case.

Abu Dhabi, which already has 32 Mirage-III aircraft, is contemplating purchasing Alpha-jet training and ground support aircraft. Kuwait, which has 20 Mirage F-1 interceptors hopes to increase its fleet of air defense aircraft.

To whom or to what should Abu Dhabi's and Kuwait's vacillations be attributed? Apparently to the Iraqi-Iranian war which is making the potential clientele think. This conflict shows that the possession by any country in this region of a military arsenal deemed too offensive by its neighbors also increases the risks of brining down the wrath of a potential adversary on its territory and, hence, that such an arsenal does not constitute a protective umbrella guaranteeing its relative invulnerability or impunity and sparing it irreparable damage.

One of the main lessons of the Iraqi-Iranian war is probably that many Near East countries, attracted by the latest offensive "gadget" which is often difficult to use, have all too long failed to take account of air defense which keeps the adversary away from their own "sanctuary."

Therefore they are reviewing their priorities. Governments and general staffs are recalculating because, although the oil-producing countries are not short of money, they nonetheless do not have inexhaustible supplies and choices have to be made. Hence stems the efforts made by some Gulf states recently on air cover or coastal defense.

In the case of Abu Dhabi and Kuwait there is, in addition to these considerations, the fact that these two countries are carefully observing France's attitude in the crisis which is now setting the Near East aflame. In particular they seem anxious to know whether France will deliver the first Mirage aircraft bought by Iraq--in which case Paris will have chosen its camp as the Iranians would allege--or if the promised supplies will wait at French bases until Iraqi pilots are sufficiently trained at the operational level.

Many French negotiators feel that their Near East clientele's vacillations conceal differences of opinion over France's political role in this region of the world as a third power or "profiteer" between the two superpowers.

If France's reputation were to be undermined in any way many French arms industrialists privately fear that their clients would return to U.S. protection, with the United States supplying them with equipment and, if necessary, with guarantees to provide them with military support.

MINISTERS REFUSE GALLEY CALL TO ENDORSE GISCARD

[Text] Cooperation Minister Mr Galley's statement that all the RPR ministers should support Mr Giscard d'Estaing's candidacy in the coming presidential election (see LE MONDE 27 November) has prompted vigorous reactions from several of his colleagues.

Alain Peyrefitte, justice minister and former RPR deputy for Seine-et-Marne, said: "Mr Galley spoke in a personal capacity. Since the campaign has not yet begun, I have no desire to commit myself. As I have already said, you do not decide your seating arrangement 6 months before the meal and without knowing who the guests are."

Jean Matteoli, labor minister and former RPR national cooperation secretary, also said that it was too early to decide and explained that he did not approve of Mr Galley's statement, which did not convince him.

Maurice Papon, budget minister and former RPR deputy for Cher, announced that "if I have anything to say, I will say it myself." Last, Mr Jacques Limouzy, secretary of state for relations with Parliament and former RPR deputy for Tarn, said that he had not yet decided on his choice of candidate. He added: "A candidacy, albeit keenly supported by many people, is not a candidacy until it is publicly announced. If it is wise and is necessary because of imperative domestic and international obligations to postpone announcing this candidacy, then it is also wise for me to postpone any comment."

SIGNIFICANCE OF BARRE REMARKS ON GISCARD WEIGHED

[Alain Rollat report: "Barre 'Delighted'"]

[Text] Raymond Barre is pleased with Valery Giscard d'Estaing. He said this to Gaullist and Giscardian senators with whom he had talks behind closed doors at the Palais du Luxembourg on Thursday, 4 December. The premier was anxious to make this known to public opinion, since he asked his press office to issue the following statement summing up his satisfaction:

"I am delighted that the president of the republic has solemnly fixed the struggle against rising prices as the central axis of government policy. I have, for my part, been constantly saying for several weeks now that the main objective in economic policy should be the struggle against inflation. The president's statement will end the calculations and hopes of those who think that economic policy would change course toward recovery and expansion at any price in the next few months."

This type of official statement from the Hotel Matignon is too rare for its exceptional nature not to be highlighted. Indeed it is unusual for the premier to comment on the head of state's remarks even if it is to express "delight." Mr Barre probably thought that neither the spectacular, staged handshake in the hall of the Elysee on Wednesday, 19 November to show that the president of the republic and his premier still have cordial relations, nor the disdain he had personally poured--to the CENTRAL PRESS AGENCY on 27 November--on the "illusions" of the "political microcosm," had been enough to dispel the doubts which his own statements had cast on his relations with Giscard d'Estaing.

In taking note of the head of state's firm intentions the government chief is showing, therefore, that he no longer doubts that Giscard d'Estaing will avoid any "laxity" as the election approaches. "A policy has been chosen and we must abide by it," guarding against "misunderstanding," "doubts" and "uncertainties" because "the French people like things to be clear." So much for Poniatowski, who advocates "a new policy and new men after the presidential elections!"

However, Mr Barre adds a special sense of humor to his satisfaction when he expresses delight at the fact that the struggle against inflation will henceforth be the "central axis of government policy." Was it not precisely to give priority to the struggle against rising prices that the president of the republic appointed the "best French economist" to the Hotel Matignon in 1976? Mr Barre is leaning toward sarcasm. Unless of course his expression of delight is simply the result of irony...toward Giscard d'Estaing.

L'HUMANITE ON PCF RELATIONSHIP WITH SOVIET UNION

LD101205 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 14 Nov 80 pp 1, 2

[Andre Wurmser article: "The No-Men"]

[Text] It is quite reasonable not to give France any foreign socialism as a model. If there is an attack in the USSR on the rights that we consider fundamental, it is right and necessary that our dissension be publicly asserted. It would be absurd to claim that all is well in the socialist countries; all is not well, Comrade Marquise, but it is deplorable to forget that everything is nevertheless proceeding in the socialist manner, without unemployment or speculators, colossal fortunes, poverty, or segregation according to wealth. Our friendly criticism has nothing to do with the hostility which capitalist governments show for countries led by a communist party.

Curiously, by its very moderation our attitude enrages men of the left, from whom one would expect greater sympathy for a regime which is undoubtedly imperfect but in which the most fundamental rights are unquestionably assured: the right to work, the right to culture, the right not to be exploited by a billionaire. For them, if you do not talk like LE FIGARO, your criticims are null and void. He who does not daily denounce the USSR is a yes-man.

Certain people are devoting themselves entirely to this denunciation. The weekly petitions which they initiate and which win them surprising partners are aimed in one direction, like their political activity. Not only is the socialist states' achievement not positive, but there is nothing positive to the credit of those countries. And, moreover, whatever capitalism's attitude to them gives one to believe, they are not socialist.

In an Irish novel, "The Pot of Gold," there is a philosopher whose every quoted sentence begins in the same way: "No, said the philosopher." No, say our censurers. Whatever the USSR does, it is wrong. It intervenes in Afghanistan? It is guilty. It does not intervene in Poland? Then it is hesitating, all the more so since it is threatened with their censure in advance. These people are no-men, unconditional anti-Sovietists. Do not wonder whether they dreamed for a moment of warning Reagan against applying his program: possible blockade of Cuba, intervention against American liberals, support for dictatorships. They do not have the time for that. They are fully occupied with criticizing the Soviet Union.

I ought to conclude with this commonsense observation: It is no more praiseworthy to be a no-man than a yes-man. The problem is that I can only see yes-men among the slanders and insults of our opponents, and I need not go far to find the no-men.

MARCHAIS ON RELATIONS WITH PS, ELECTIONS

LD100857 [Editorial Report] Paris L'HUMANITE in French on 28 November carries on page 4 a 1,400-word report on a speech delivered by PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais in Charleville on 27 November. Marchais reportedly commented on statements made by PS First Secretary Mitterrand on French television and stressed, with regard to the French presidential election, that "nothing is settled, not even who will stand in the second round," urging PCF supporters to "struggle." Marchais reportedly went on to say that a new union can only be achieved by "stepping up the struggles, swelling the demand for real democratic reforms...and making the PCF stronger." He went on to stress that the PCF is the only party which can bring about the necessary change.

FORLANI COMMENTS ON POLISH SITUATION, PCI STANCE

LD101836 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0700 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Interview with Italian Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani aboard the plane taking him to Italy from his visit to the FRG on 9 December--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Mr Forlani, what is the assesement of the two governments, of the FRG and Italy, of the present situation in Poland?

[Answer] It is the same assessment as the one we had the opportunity to express in the past few days when the heads of state and government of the countries of the Community met at the headquarters of the European Council. It is a stance which expresses the common preoccupation and hope that external elements will not intervene in the Polish events and try to affect them. There is also a common (?view) that external intervention would represent a regressive act, an aggravation of the international situation, which would put the situation back for many years with consequences which today are hard to evaluate. There is the preoccupation, therefore, to make everyone aware--above all the Soviet Union--of the need to respect the principles which were solemnly underwritten in the Helsinki Final Act and which envisage respect for autonomy and national sovereignty of the various countries.

[Question] Do the two countries and, as a matter of principle, all countries belonging to the Atlantic alliance attending the meeting in Brussels, have identical stances about this?

[Answer] I think so. However, the meeting will be held the day after tomorrow and the annual meeting of the defense and foreign ministers at the headquarters of the Atlantic Council will certainly examine this emerging aspect of the international situation, and I believe that in this forum, too, the common preoccupation will be manifested.

[Question] Yesterday the Italian Communist Party published the text of a letter sent to various East European communist parties. The invasion of Poland--this letter says in essence--will have (?serious) consequences for the relations between the various communist parties. What do you think of this stance by the Italian Communist Party?

[Answer] Well, I believe that everything that at this moment helps to promote the elements of caution and reflection should be considered in a positive manner. I therefore consider this initiative positive.

[Question] Can this in some way modify the views of Christian Democracy about the PCI?

[Answer] This PCI view concerning the Polish situation contains points which correspond to the view of the government and its majority parties, as well as of other political forces. The dialectics which exist between the parties, however, is not limited to this aspect alone and concerns many other problems.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON BERLINGUER-ZAGLADIN TALKS

[Text] The official communique issued by the PCI describes the meeting held this morning between PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer and Vadim Zagladin, first deputy chairman of the CPSU Central Committee International Department, as a long and frank conversation between comrades.

The meeting, the communique states, was also attended by Smirnov, of the CPSU Central Committee International Department, and Italian leaders Gian Carlo Pajetta, Paolo Bufalini, Antonio Rubbi and Radolfo Mechini. During the conversation, the representatives of the PCI and the CPSU expressed with frankness their stances on major international themes and especially outlined their respective stances on the events in the People's Republic of Poland.

The PCI stance on the risks involved in a foreign intervention in the Polish affairs is already known. An article by Luciano Barca which will appear in the next issue of RINASCITA further clarifies it. After emphasizing that what is happening in Poland represents a great contribution to the relaunching of the values of socialism, the Communist leader states that Poland can develop its positive process of renovation provided that no one tries to interfere in the choices of the Polish people.

The statement issued by the international offices of the CGIL, the CISL [Italian Confederation of Workers Unions] and the UIL [Italian Union of Labor] is no less explicit. It renews the full solidarity of the unitarian federations with the Polish workers. The international offices of the Italian trade unions also point out the dangers and dramatic consequences of a repressive action against the Polish workers and a possible military intervention against their country. The trade union international offices in conclusion make it known that the leader of the Polish trade unions, Walesa, has accepted the invitation of the unitarian confederation to come to Italy.

NATTA EXPOUNDS PCI CASE FOR GOVERNMENT ROLE

LD100915 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 4 Dec 80 pp 1, 21

[Report on PCI Secretariat member Alessandro Natta interview with RINASCITA: "We Are Proposing an Alternative, Learning the Lesson of Events"]

[Text] Can one speak in terms of a "swing" in Communist policy? This question--at the center of the political debate following the document approved on Friday by the PCI Directorate--was answered in an interview granted to RINASCITA by Comrade Alessandro Natta, who elucidated the significance of the terms of the Communist proposal.

"In my opinion," Natta says, "many comments and statements reflect a kind of difficulty in forming a verdict on the merits of the stances that we have adopted. I believe that even the recurrent question of whether or not we are abandoning our fundamental strategic approach reflects this difficulty. I really do not believe that one can talk in terms of any change in blueprint for a thorough regeneration of society and the state, based on unitary relations on the left and also on the quest for positive relations with the historical component of Italian democracy constituted by people's and Catholic-inspired movement, including the DC. This is no reversal of strategy, but there certainly has been a development--including some major innovative elements--of a political stance that we have been adopting--if you want to establish a starting point--since January 1979, that is, since we realized that a phase of national solidarity had come to an end, in a negative way, particularly through the fault of the DC leadership group."

[Question] But hasn't there been a change in the overall verdict on the DC and its "power system?"

"I really do not believe it can be said that we decided to start denouncing or combating this power system last week," Natta replied. But one must bear in mind that "this year, in recent months and weeks, there has been a dramatic acceleration in the Italian crisis." "A moral issue, which is also political and constitutional, has erupted, exposing the full extent of the distortions and damage which this power system and mode of government have introduced into the state." Therefore "it would have been bad, very bad, if we had not learned the necessary lesson from all this."

Natta stressed two essential elements of this "lesson": "First, we--but not really only ourselves, but a major section of the country--have realized that the DC, as it is, is unsuited to leading a hard and difficult task of material, political and moral reform. Second, we have clearly and most lucidly asserted our role as the principal democratic opposition force. It is a duty, for a force such as ours and in such a tragic situation, to try our utmost to be the principle subject of a democratic government alternative, to indicate a path and to put forward a proposed political solution to the crisis."

But several objections have been made to this suggestion. It is said, for instance, that the PCI does not hold a majority and that therefore, at least with the present balance of forces, its proposal would lack constitutional legitimacy.

Natta points out that "not even the DC has an absolute majority, though it behaves as though it did." Behind assertions of this kind there lies the widespread idea that the DC, the democratic state and the republican institutions are one and the same thing; that democratic solidarity, viewed as a shared identification with certain fundamental principles and values, can only be guaranteed by DC centrality. But it is precisely this exclusive view that constitutes the prime cause of the stifling of Italian democracy, of the troubles and damage with which we are now grappling."

[PSI secretary] Bettino Craxi, however, objects that this "is not the right time...." Natta says that of course "this is not the right time to immediately prompt a government crisis." But "it is the right time to specifically raise the issue of the country's political leadership."

Interpretations of the PCI Directorate document as propagandist are merely "a pretext and absurd." "Can anybody really believe," Natta asks, "that we proposed a kind of Communist single-party government augmented by a few experts and honest individuals, whether independent or from other parties?" Apart from anything else, the Communists would be giving a "resounding demonstration of inconsistency" if they proposed--"and in the form of the worst kind of extremism"--a "kind of Communist 'centrality' to offset DC 'centrality.'"

"First," Natta says, "let us clear away any unnecessary misunderstandings. Our proposal is addressed primarily to the country, because it takes into account public spirit as it now is and the extent of the awareness of the tragic nature of the situation. But when we say that we need a government capable of representing and uniting Italian democracy's best forces, we are talking about an organized form of democracy, reflected primarily in the parties. So it is the political forces, starting with the leftwing ones, that we are addressing."

Having confirmed the PCI's determined opposition to early elections (an "irresponsible and rash" hypothesis), Natta explains in what sense the PCI's arguments are addressed primarily to the leftwing forces, starting with the PSI. "We have maintained and continue to maintain that the way out of the crisis is not within the context of the present government coalition nor through 'conflictive collaborations' or alternations at the Chigi Palace between the DC and the PSI. This is a source of debate and even polemic with the Socialist comrades. But I believe that the proposal that we are putting forward can advance the PCI-PSI dialogue and help to reopen the dialogue within the left at closer quarters. I would add that there are also other forces--let us call them by name: for instance, the Republicans and Liberals--sensitive to the problems of morality, integrity and honesty, in short, forces which are not involved or which no longer want to be involved in government malpractices. Well, as long as now unacceptable arguments concerning 'prejudices' against us are left aside, here too there can be guarantors and protagonists of a change."

There are some Christian Democrats, such as Galloni, who maintain that the PCI is abandoning the national solidarity policy. Natta replies by saying that "the lesson of history is important here."

The Communists have had "the courage to pursue a policy and to pay the price." But who was it who wanted to "attack and erode this policy"? "I consider it somewhat strange," Natta observes, "that the once-cursed historical compromise is now being mourned by the DC. Of course we are not suggesting the erection of barricades. What we say is that the DC has failed the test to which it submitted in the mid-seventies, in its attempt to combine the introduction of a new phase in political life, its own internal regeneration and progress beyond a certain mode of government and of wielding power." Does it now want to resubmit to this test? "Let it do so by all means," Natta says: "we will judge the results. Meanwhile it would be a good thing--above all for the country but perhaps also for better resolving its own troubles--if the DC spent some time in opposition."

What are the reactions within the PCI? Is there not a danger of "stubbornness and regressions?" This is Natta's reply: "When a party with the strength of 30 percent of the vote and as well established among the workers and in the country as we are puts itself forward for the country's leadership and points to an alternative, I believe it is proposing precisely the opposite of a careful administration of its own forces perhaps 'guaranteed' by some sectarian regression. In fact it is emphasizing all its characteristics as a government force and developing the debate on policy as we did at the latest Central Committee meeting. Perhaps there are some comrades who are overjoyed, claiming that they had always said so; perhaps other comrades are worried for the opposite reason. It is a matter of resolving erroneous attitudes, wherever they occur. But the reaction of the party--a party I repeat, sensitive to what is happening among the people--is very different and very positive."

One more issue is broached in the interview: Would the debate and initiative be more satisfactory if, apart from stressing the "exceptional" nature of the Communist proposal, we made it clear that "there is an intention to reintroduce the prospect of a national unity government or to help build a leftwing alternative"?

Natta replies that our insistence on the "exceptional" nature of the Directorate's proposal "shows that the circumscribed objectives and time scale of the proposal itself are clear to us." This "does not mean, of course, that it is simply a matter of 'good government' or of people with 'clean hands,' though these really do not seem of secondary importance." "The problem posed by the emergency situation," Natta stressed, "concerns both substance and approach: who will lead the rebuilding of one-third of southern Italy and along what lines of development? What kind of state must be made capable of functioning, what kind of regional government, what kind of local administration, now that we have all seen what the DC has done with the south? People cannot reply to us that in order to tackle these problems it is necessary to introduce socialism, but neither must they tell us that all that is needed is to plug the holes."

In what main direction do we intend to move? "I reply that we have indicated some major objectives, laid down the conditions and premises for making real progress toward a regeneration of society and the institutions and that we have thrown down a challenge." Natta explains that "an initiative of this kind is not addressed soley to 'others' and that it is not simply a matter of awaiting replies questioning ourselves as well. Not in the sense--exploited for ulterior motives by some people--that before putting ourselves forward as a government force we must resolve certain unresolved problems of our history and policy. Our entire history demonstrates our democratic 'legitimacy': It should now be clear to all that more than ever the question of 'legitimizing' the PCI to govern by means of a kind of permit issued to us by others just does not arise. On the contrary it is we who are saying that the DC, as it is now, is not--to use the same expression--'legitimized' for performing a politically and morally satisfactory leadership. It is obvious however, that the more progress is made by the political process that we have put on the country's agenda, the more our fundamental options--Eurocommunism and a new internationalism--will be open to assessment and able to develop in practice."

PORTUGAL TO RECEIVE FINANCIAL AID FROM EEC

[Text] Freitas do Amaral yesterday signed in Brussels the "joint actions" agreement with the EEC, which lays down the terms for granting our country financial aid totaling 19.5 million contos, to be allocated for development projects until the date of entry into the European communities. On the occasion, the deputy prime minister stated that "the idea of Europe will henceforth show a face of real solidarity."

The agreement was signed on behalf of the Nine by Luxembourg Foreign Minister Collette Flesch.

The document, which will come into force 1 January 1981, lays down the overall sums and the areas of allocation of the money, but does not specify the projects covered, which will be the subject of technical analyses by EEC and Portuguese delegations.

The total amount involved is 275 million European Currency Units [ECU], about 19.5 million contos. This amount will be granted in two parts: 125 million ECU in nonrepayable subsidies granted on an exceptional basis and 150 million ECU in loans from the European Investment Bank. Part of the subsidies (25 million ECU) will be to finance a 3-percent discount on part of the total bank loan.

The total grant from the EEC available for direct investments thus amounts to 100 million ECU (about 7 million contos), which represents a 64-percent reduction with respect to Portugal's initial request early this year for 278.21 million ECU.

Portugal's proposal, which included a total of 40 million contos in nonrepayable loans and subsidies, was refused first by the Commission, the EEC's executive body, and subsequently by the Council of Ministers, composed of representatives from each of the member states. The EEC's final decision was taken 7 October and established the total figure of 19.5 million contos.

The agreement signed in Brussels yesterday envisages the EEC's financing of 40 percent of the costs stemming from the construction of stretches of roadway, airports, schools and training centers and the improvement and restructuring of agricultural exports. EEC funds, complemented by national funds, will also make it possible to guarantee the navigability of the Douro, to introduce a plan to support small and medium enterprises and to encourage industrial development [loteamento] in various parts of the country.

In a short speech at the signing ceremony Freitas do Amaral said that the measures envisaged in the agreement "will be of decisive importance in the process of adapting Portugal's economic structures" and "will be indispensable in supporting the efforts to facilitate Portugal's harmonious integration into the Community."

The deputy prime minister added that the joint action plan "will give the Portuguese administration a more thorough acquaintance with the Community's working methods and the machinery behind it," stressing that the plans included in it were embodied in the 1981-1983 medium-term plan, thus becoming an "integral part of general economic policy measures with a view to modernizing Portugal's economic and social structures."

Lorenzo Natali, vice chairman of the EEC Commission and the man responsible for matters concerning the expansion of the EEC, stated that the agreement "demonstrates the Community's desire for Portugal to join the family as soon and as harmoniously as possible."

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS ANALYZES ELECTION RESULTS

[Editorial: "Two Majorities"]

[Text] Contrary to many forecasts made throughout the campaign, the presidential election was decided on the first round. In itself this fact alone makes possible some immediate conclusions. The first of them is without any doubt the political sensitivity displayed by the Portuguese people, 6 years after the restoration of democracy, in immediately perceiving the basic options offered to them from among the half dozen candidacies on which they were called to decide. Except for Ramalho Eanes and Soares Carneiro, all the other candiates did not achieve more than an insignificant number of votes.

But there are other conclusions to be drawn of which the "party indiscipline" manifested in the presidential election is certainly not the least important. This was the case in 1976, when the personality of Otelo [Saraiva de Carvolho] still haloed by the glories reaped during the revolutionary period, caused many Communist Party members and perhaps Socialists to turn a deaf ear to the party leaderships' advice. It has happened again now with Ramalho Eanes, who won a significant percentage of votes from the Democratic Alliance despite the parliamentary majority's commitment to the election of Soares Carneiro. These facts demonstrate that the electorate although apportioned among political parties considers above all the candidates' personalities and bases its voting on them. This same mechanism might explain despite everything why Otelo Saraiva de Carvalho secured the vote which he did 4 years ago and why he now finds himself relegated to an insignificant percentage. The fact is that at that time he still constituted a symbol, a mobilizing myth for all those who felt defeated 25 November. Over 4 years later, his image displays the effects not only of the erosion but also of the obsolescence to which he has been consigned. Without party support and being only a pale memory Otelo could aspire to no other fate.

Rather negatively this same conclusion could be drawn from the fact that the Democratic Alliance did not succeed in having Soares Carneiro elected, despite the amount which it staked of course on its candidate. But however many analyses still remain to be made the election now belongs to the past. And at this moment the most urgent thing is the problems stemming from the choice made by the Portuguese people. They are problems which logically point toward the necessary flexibility which the verdict delivered yesterday required both from the government and from the president of the republic. Ballasted by diametrically opposing forces the parliamentary majority and the presidential majority overlap in a significant band of the electrorate. This entails a responsibility involving the normal functioning of the institutions. This is the real outcome of this year's elections. Any other interpretation of the results specifically that which might result in the presenting of tabs to Eanes by the forces which supported him, would misrepresent the Portuguese people's wishes in 1980.

PINTO BALSEMAO POSSIBLE PSD PRIME MINISTER CHOICE

[Excerpts] The National Political Committee of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] has been meeting at the party's headquarters for discussions pertaining to the guidelines of the Social Democratic strategy to be pursued in the present political situation. The National Political Committee is to propose to the National Council at this Saturday's meeting the name of the figure who is to head the future cabinet.

Increasingly mentioned in political circles close to the PSD is the name of Francisco Pinto Balsemao, founding member of the PSD, chairman of the party's International Relations Department and present minister assistant in the outgoing cabinet. Right at this moment, Pinto Balsemao appears to enjoy the support of important sections of his party, such as the public support expressed by the head of the Azores regional government, Mota Amaral. Cavaco e Silva, Eurico de Melo and Antonio Capucho are believed to have also expressed their support for his nomination.

In Maderia, Albert Joao Jardim [head of the regional government] has also expressed his support for Pinto Balsemao.

All this, however, is at the moment nothing but speculation, and the only reason why we mention it is because this has been told to journalists by leading members of the PSD. Meetings this weekend of the PSD and the Social Democratic Center top bodies will, however, provide the first reliable indications as to the name of the future prime minister and the cabinet lineup.

MULTIPARTY APPROACH TO DEFENSE SEEN COLLAPSING

LD100939 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 28 Nov 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Defense Without Agreement"]

[Text] To give the defense minister his due, he is a master of delaying tactics. Significant, and for this government, unusual tactical skills are needed to lead defense negotiations for a whole year without making an inch of progress. It is over a year since the defense minister published the estimates of the consequences of three models for a defense agreement for the eighties--the 3-percent, 1.5-percent and zero solutions, and it is almost a year since he entered the negotiations for an agreement with the government demand that the zero solution be the foundation of Denmark's future defense, despite the fact that the zero solution with its cuts in Danish combat readiness, would go back on Danish commitments to and weaken the basic requirements of allied defense. Throughout the spring and fall he has kept the defense negotiations alive with a broad pretense involving hints that the government was ready to talk when it came to the crunch. But the crunch never came, and there have never been any real negotiations on an agreement, which would budget the government from its demand for an unchanged defense budget. The government has remained at absolute zero.

Yesterday the defense negotiations were broken off, so that the government could have the time and opportunity to have the 1981 budget act with its unchanged defense budget passed by the Folketing. The negotiations have not broken down, the negotiators say, and it is not the zero solution that the government will get through the Folketing in the budget act. And so far they are quite right, for the Sjaelland Barracks will not be evacuated and converted into summer homes immediately after the act is passed. But they can hardly live in the illusion that the government will be more willing to accept a real defense agreement when it has steered its unchanged defense budget through the Folketing unscathed, albeit with the necessary support of the leftwing parties. Once the government has gone it alone with an unchanged defense budget, and has succeeded unscathed, there will not really be much realistic possibility of forcing it to increase the budget in 1981. Knud Heinesen, the political strategist behind the defense minister, said after the breakoff of negotiations yesterday that if any results are to be achieved in the defense agreement negotiations after new year both sides must give somewhat. But the Social Democrats will not give much. And he is probably right about that.

There is still the theoretical possibility of a defense agreement, but the tightrope leading to it has been worn exceedingly thin. We seem to be on our way into a period in which defense will no longer be respected as the matter of joint political concern it has been since the war, but will be turned into the government's own business. It is a worrying and regrettable trend, but accords well with the self-sufficient attitude with which so many of the country's interests are now approached.

SWEDEN

COMMANDER IN CHIEF ON DEFENSE SPENDING, TASKS

LD101219 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 17 Nov 80 p 20

[Kaj Schueler interview with Swedish Commander in Chief Gen Lennart Ljung: "Afghanistan Lowers Threshold for Superpower Invasions"]

[Text] "The prospects of proper detente between the superpowers during the eighties look a lot worse now than in the past. The Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan can be construed to mean that the threshold for invasions in countries bordering the superpowers is lower than in the past."

This is the view of the commander in chief, Gen Lennart Ljung, who views the most recent events in the world with great concern, especially the war between Iran and Iraq and the unrest in Poland. At the same time he is pleased that the Swedish people's willingness to defend themselves has increased dramatically.

"Events in the last year have shown that there is a greater preparedness to use military resources to achieve political goals than many people had believed. This also increases the risks of military activity in many parts of the world," Commander in Chief Lennart Ljung said in a TIDNINGARNAS TELEGRAMBYRAA interview.

Within both the Warsaw Pact and NATO marked rearmament is taking place. That NATO decision to increase military spending by 3 percent a year for the next 5 years is one of the biggest investments in a long time.

"A large part of these resources are intended to strengthen NATO's combat readiness in Europe. But after the events in the Middle East the United States is probably inclined to reinforce its combat forces in the Indian Ocean. Because of the dramatic events in the oil-producing nations the United States has increased its naval strength in the area. Naval units have been transferred from the North Atlantic to the Indian Ocean. This has upset the balance in the North Atlantic, the Soviet Union has thus been given greater freedom in these areas, and this could influence the military situation in northern Europe. On the Kola Peninsula, in the northwestern Soviet Union, the Soviet Union has its largest strategic nuclear arms base."

[Question] Negotiations are now going on within NATO over contingency stockpiling of materiel in Norway for a marine platoon of up to 10,000 men. How does this affect the military situation?

[Answer] For Norway, as far as I can see, contingency stockpiling is a way of obtaining a better guarantee that some of the NATO reinforcements can arrive in time. But it is natural for the Soviet Union to follow these preparations with great attention, because of the nearness of the Murmansk bases.

[Question] A few days ago in DAGENS NYHETER a Soviet journalist warned Sweden that the Soviet Union could shoot down cruise missiles over Swedish territory if we do not do so ourselves. What are your comments?

[Answer] I am surprised, to say the least, by the announcement that the Soviet Union is prepared for acts of aggression over Swedish territory. We will defend ourselves. We will protect our territory and will defend ourselves to the best of our ability against both cruise missiles and aircraft carrying nuclear arms. But neither Sweden nor any other country can give 100-percent guarantees that it will be able to protect itself against everything.

The commander in chief does not think that events in Poland have any direct effect on the military balance between the Warsaw Pact and NATO.

"But it is probably inevitable that, if the unrest spreads to other Warsaw Pact countries--East Germany, for example--it could mean greater risks to world peace."

[Question] Is the ratification of SALT II important?

[Answer] I think this would be a very good thing. It is important to do everything to limit nuclear arms, to improve international cooperation.

[Question] Would it be a good thing to hold a disarmament conference in Sweden?

"Yes, it has good prospects of producing results," the commander in chief stressed. The global political situation and the ever increasing military interests in northern Scandinavia mean, according to Lennart Ljung, that Swedish defenses must not be weakened.

"We must be prepared for surprise attacks to a greater extent than in the past. We must improve our ability to heighten our readiness quickly, improve mobilization and move units from one part of the country to another quickly.

"Northern Norrland is an extremely exposed area. We must improve our capacity to airlift military personnel to Norrland quickly."

The commander in chief thinks it important to have a balanced defense suited to all types of attack. The different branches of the services--the army, air force and navy--are growing increasingly dependent on each other's support.

"The defense forces must be given the economic resources they need to maintain an army of conscripts and to develop a Swedish aircraft."

[Question] How do the government's future savings campaigns affect defense?

[Answer] For several years defense has been taking a smaller share of society's resources. In 10 years we have cut staff by around 17 percent, that is 8,000 men. In such an uncertain world we cannot shrink the defense forces any further.

[Question] Did the recent submarine hunt show weaknesses in defense?

[Answer] We are looking into the matter at the moment, and I do not want to make any detailed statements about it. However it did show that there are many international regulations which limit the ability to combat submarines in peacetime. I do not think that any other country has succeeded in forcing a foreign submarine to the surface.

Even though the commander in chief views the military trends with concern, he thinks that we still have a long way to go before a major war.

"The deterrent factors are enormous. There have to be extremely dramatic crises before anyone intentionally acts in such a way as to lead to war.

"If there is a new war in which the superpowers are involved I think that it will start as a conventional war. Of course there is always the risk that it will escalate into a nuclear war."

This gloomy picture is brightened, according to the commander in chief, by the fact that willingness to defend Sweden, in his opinion, has grown considerably in recent years. This is true both of conscripts in the 18-24 age range and of the adult population.

"It is abundantly clear that ever growing numbers of people realize how important it is that we defend our independence. Civil defense forces, for example, are much larger than they were during World War II.

"It is even possible to notice these changes within our army units. I believe that it is a consequence of better relations between conscripts and officers, but also of the fact that young people are more loyal than was the case during the troubled years at the end of the sixties and the beginning of the seventies."

PYM COMMENTS ON NATO DISCUSSIONS ON POLAND

[Text] Defence Secretary Francis Pym said today that NATO was ready to take quick political action if Russia invades Poland, but he added that a military response to an invasion was not being considered.

Mr Pym said in Brussels after a meeting of NATO defence ministers that the Soviet Union was under no illusions about the consequences of intervention in Poland.

There was now a widely held view that if the Russians took "this appalling action of using their military might," discussions on human rights, security and arms limitations would be pointless, he went on.

"It is no good talking about human rights, detente and arms controls while the military build up that we have seen on Poland's borders continues."

The Polish crisis was hastily put at the top of the agenda at what was to have been a routine biennial NATO review this week.

Mr Pym returned to London this afternoon and Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington will take over in Brussels tomorrow to discuss policy matters and the Soviet build-up on the Polish border.

Mr Pym echoed U.S. Defence Secretary Harold Brown who said after the meeting that it was important to make a strong response from the West in advance of any possible intervention by the Russians.

JAPAN'S ITO MEETS WITH LEADERS, DISCUSSES POLAND

[Text] London, 10 Dec (KYODO)--British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher said Wednesday the possibility of the Soviet Union intervening in Poland cannot be ruled out and added detente will come to an end if such a situation occurs.

She also told Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito that the Madrid conference to study security in Europe cannot be continued, negotiations on disarmament will become difficult and the problem of economic sanctions against the Soviet Union will crop up if that country intervened in Poland.

She pledged that West European nations will consult with Japan as well as the United States on the matter.

Thatcher met with Ito, who arrived in London from Paris Tuesday, for some 30 minutes.

Thatcher welcomed the election of Ronald Reagan as president of the United States and believed he will carry out clearcut policies on diplomatic and domestic economic problems.

She expressed apprehension over the sharp rise in crude oil prices in connection with the Iran-Iraq war.

Ito said that complicated factors will crop up should the Iran-Iraq war spread further and added attainment of package peace in the Middle East was extremely important for world peace and economy. During the meeting, Ito presented to Thatcher a letter from Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki.

Japanese officials said the problem of trade frictions between Japan and Euprope was not taken up at the meeting.

Ito later met for some 90 minutes with Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington and discussed the situation in Poland and trade problems.

Carrington told Ito that the Western countries will take actions more severe than those at the time of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan should the Soviet Union intervene in Poland.

On Japan-Europe trade frictions, the British foreign secretary said he hoped that the matter of trade imbalance would be settled.

He thus indirectly sought concrete measures by Japan to deal with the problem.

Ito agreed that the problem should be settled.

The Japanese foreign minsiter left London for Brussels Wednesday night.

DOUGLAS HURD ON SEARCH FOR MIDEAST SETTLEMENT

LD100931 Paris AN-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AD-DUWALI in Arabic 8-14 Dec 80 pp 34-35

[Interview with Minister of State for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office Douglas Hurd in London--date not given]

[Excerpts] London--[Question] How do you in the Common Market view a solution for a settlement in the Middle East?

[Answer] There are two principles to which everybody must be committed, including Israel and the PLO. These are Israel's right to exist and the Palestinian people's right to self-determination. I believe that these two principles are indispensable and we must try to make them acceptable to Israel and the PLO. Israel is likely to reject one thing one day and the PLO another thing another day. We must change this situation of hesitation and rejection if we really want and believe in a settlement.

[Question] An opinion has been expressed calling for Soviet participation in the peace process in some way, probably not at the beginning but at latter stages because it is difficult to conceive of a final solution without Moscow's support, if peace is not to be exposed to danger.

[Answer] I believe that this point is disputable.

[Question] Why?

[Answer] Because the Soviet Union is not a principal state in the Middle East issue. I do not exclude it from a solution but I will not have it participate in it. I believe that the question needs to be studied, at present I believe that this is an open question.

[Question] The Camp David agreements have not succeeded as expected. Western views about them were wrong from the beginning. What is to be done now that they have reached a deadlock?

[Answer] Camp David has achieved a great thing. It has achieved peace between Egypt and Isarel. If we look at the past 30 years, we find that what has been achieved is really significant. However, I believe that you are right in saying that Camp David has not been able to offer more--that is, it has not solved the Palestinian issue.

I am not aware of the new American president's stand on Camp David and the autonomy negotiations. In the Venice statement we laid down a formula through which we have overcome some of the Camp David ambiguities but which does not conflict with the substance of Camp David and can rather be described as equal to it. The two points we are stressing are Israel's right to exist and the Palestinians' right to self-determination. Naturally, this depends on the attitude to be adopted by Presidents Reagan and As-Sadat and Israeli Prime Minister Menahem Begin. I am not aware of their stands but our stand on Camp David is very clear.

[Question] President Reagan said at a press conference that Jordan is a key to the solution of the Palestinian problem. Do you believe that King Husayn will possibly agree to making Jordan a Palestinian homeland? Will the PLO agree to King Husayn becoming the spokesman for the Palestinians? Don't you believe that President Reagan has made an erroneous start by this attitude?

[Answer] We have to wait and see what President Reagan will do. However, I believe that President Reagan was right when he said that Jordan must have a principal role in finding a settlement to the Palestinian issue. Jordan has rejected the Camp David agreements. It is necessary to have Jordan participate in the peace negotiations. It is even more necessary to find the right way to make Jordan participate, especially because King Husayn has long experience in government affairs. King Husayn has strongly supported the Venice statement and this is one of the sound reasons which make us emphasize his role and Jordan's role. We believe that the formulas or the principles which we have proposed are suitable for finding a way to make Jordan join the peace process. Without Jordan, the peace process cannot continue.

[Question] Just Jordan?

[Answer] You are right. Not just Jordan, but Jordan is one of the states whose participation in the peace process is necessary.

[Question] What about Syria, Lebanon--which is paying an exorbitant price for a solution--and the PLO? King Husayn cannot represent the PLO or the Palestinian people. The king represents only 25 to 30 percent of the people in Jordan.

[Answer] King Husayn's stand is clear. He agrees to the PLO being the only legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. We discussed this point at length in the Venice statement. The opinion reached was that the PLO must participate in the peace negotiations. I agree that Jordan must not speak in the name of the other Arab states or on behalf of the Palestinian people. He, King Husayn, does not claim to speak on behalf of both, but Jordan has a role to play and it must remain part of the peace process.

[Question] Do you believe that King Husayn accepts Jordan being made a Palestinian state? Will the Palestinians accept anything less than a homeland or a state?

[Answer] Jordan remains Jordan and King Husayn is the king of Jordan. Jordan is not a Palestinian state and the PLO is the legitimate Palestinian representative. This situation was agreed upon in Rabat in 1974. To my knowledge there is no change in the Jordanian stand. Naturally it is up to the Jordanians to define this stand and not us. However, I agree with you about Lebanon and I believe that this is an important point. The continuing tragedy in Lebanon must never be ignored.

[Question] Ten years have elapsed since Britain left the Gulf. It appears that the United States, which came after you, has not succeeded in keeping the area a lake of peace. In other words, the Gulf is now regarded as the hottest spot in the world, where international conflict is most intense. How can the Gulf be rescued before the Soviet Union dominates it?

[Answer] We did not hand over the control of the Gulf to America. We gave the Gulf to the Gulf states. On the whole the Gulf states succeeded in maintaining security in the area internally and externally until the outbreak of the Iraqi-Iranian war. Security in the Gulf is now threatened because of the war. However, the answer to the security of the Gulf remains in cooperation among the Gulf states. The Western states can encourage the establishment of, and facilitate Gulf security cooperation by responding to the special demands such as the Saudi Arabian request for "AWACS" early warning planes. I do not believe in the usefulness of returning to the era of Western bases. I believe that we must not embark on any step of this kind as we did before 1971. This is out of the question. We encourage coordination and cooperation among the Gulf states and we hope to see this cooperation progressing and continuing.

PAPER ASSESSES OUTCOME OF THATCHER-HAUGHEY TALKS

[Editorial: "Ireland: A New Approach:]

[Text] Mrs Thatcher has returned from Dublin without, to all appearances, having made a single concession over the hunger strike. Moreover, she has substantially improved relations between Britain and the Republic which were in a pretty poor way before she went. These are considerable achievements which it would be churlish to disparage. Since all those engaged in the exercise, however, were tough politicans who know that there is no such thing as a free lunch, it is necessary to ask what price has been paid.

On Monday, we predicted that Mr Haughey might well decide to be reasonable over the hunger strike (after all the Republic itself has plenty of experience of that kind of tiresomeness). We expressed the fear, however, that, in return for this consideration, he might well try to persuade Mrs Thatcher to make some gesture in favour of Irish unity. There are passages in yesterday's communique which will suggest to many Ulstermen that this is precisely what she has done. Commissions are to be appointed to consider how co-operation between Britain and the Irish Republic can be improved in a whole variety of fields. They will even consider (overtones of Sunningdale) "possible new institutional structures." Does this presage some grand Rhodesia-type settlement at the end of which the people of Ulster will wake up to find themselves manoeuvred into some unwanted constitutional relationship with the south? Obviously it could. Mr Haughey will enter any such discussions with the desire to achieve at least some apparent advance towards Irish unity, though preferably one which will not go quite so far as to saddle him with responsibility for actually governing Ulster.

Mrs Thatcher's view of the matter, however, is clearly different. She makes it plain that what she is after is better relations between two sovereign states each respecting the jurisdiction of the other, and she also makes it claer that Northern Ireland is and will remain so long as its people want it to, part of the United Kingdom. Significantly, the communique says not a word about devolved government, so the presumption is that direct rule will continue to graft an Irish dimension on to the policy of full integration for Ulster in the United Kingdom. This is a hazardous enterprise but one which, as we often said before, is eminently worth trying.

TO VIMA ON BACKGROUND TO NATO REINTEGRATION

AT101330 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 10 Dec 80 p 3

[Report by Brussels correspondent V.P. Mathiopoulos: "Reintegration Within NATO Was an Obligation Undertaken Toward the EEC"]

[Text] Brussels, 9 Dec--The fact that reintegration within NATO's military wing took place before Greece's formal accession to the EEC was not a simple coincidence. It is now revealed here that throughout the negotiation process the EEC partners delicately but with sufficient clarity stressed for the benefit of the Greek side that Greece's most direct foreign problems or at least its unresolved situation with NATO, ought to be settled prior to accession.

With the passage of time in the area of Greek-NATO relations, Athens, demonstrating its determination to return to the alliance's military wing, cut down the conditions it had set at its withdrawal in August of 1974. At that time the Greek Government had argued that a return could only be discussed if the conditions which dictated withdrawal--military occupation of 40 percent of Cypriot territory--changed, in other words, only after evacuation of the northern sections of Cyprus by the invaders from continental Turkey.

In the spring of 1977 the Greek side asked for guaranteed "special relations" as a prerequisite to reintegration. This meant that in times of peace Greek Armed Forces would remain under national command. As TO VIMA reported at that time, the NATO command did not accept this condition. Protracted negotiations followed with visits by the NATO commander in chief of that time, General Alexander Haig, to Ankara. He also intended to visit Athens during one of his return trips from Ankara but due to other duties of the Greek commander in chief of that time, General Davos, the meeting was held in Brussels. In the end reintegration conditions were limited by the Greek side to a guarantee of the legal status which prevailed in the Aegean prior to withdrawal in 1974. Originally, however, even this minimum demand was neutralized by a Turkish veto. Ankara wanted first a settlement of the boundaries of operational control and Greek reintegration afterwards. It is only after the coup by the Turkish generals and intensive activities by NATO's General Rogers that Ankara agreed that arrangements in the Aegean should be resolved after Greece reintegrates.

Naturally this method gives the Greek side the advantage that, being within NATO, it now also possesses the veto while if the arrangements had been made before reintegration then only Turkey would have had the veto. However, the true situation within the alliance--as an observer can discern on the basis of diplomatic information available here--is dominated by the general belief that the factor of Turkey, as a gateway to oil and in the middle of the mortal crisis in the Near and Middle East--hot Iran-Iraq war and the Syrian-Jordan confrontation together with the permanent threat of Israeli-Arab conflicts--has disproportionately increased its strategic importance to the West.

In this way Greece will be confronted by an unbearable situation during discussions to be held on the settlement of the Aegean issue at the NATO Military Committee and also perhaps during the council of permanent representatives and later at the level of defense and foreign ministers. This is also due to the fact that France, which has always supported Greek positions, is not a member of the military committee and it would be difficult to find any other country among all the others which would support a Greek veto in face of the general belief that it is Turkey which ought to be the advance post of the alliance in an area in which the West has already lost serious support since the fall of the shah.

The interview by the Greek foreign minister in the London TIMES proves that it was made very clear to the Greek side that its foreign differences and particularly its differences with Turkey ought to be solved prior to its full accession to the Common Market. He mentioned in this interview that by 1 January 1981 Greek-Turkish negotiations will have advanced to such a degree that the EEC would not inherit the differences between Athens and Ankara. He also spoke of an already much improved climate in relations.

In an answer from Ankara his Turkish colleague stated he does not know whether progress has been achieved on the Aegean and that he hopes that by the end of February there will be sufficient progress in the internal Cypriot dialogue. In other words, he transferred any prospects of definite progress into an entirely different sector. This sector, however, as Athens has repeatedly stressed, does not fall within the area of Greek-Turkish negotiations. It has been mentioned that as an independent country Cyprus proceeds with negotiations between the two communities and that when the time for an agreement does arrive then Greece would be willing to contribute with advice and its presence for the purpose of signing such an agreement.

The second decisive factor which pressured the Western side to proceed with Greece's reintegration within NATO's military wing is to be found in the "freezing" of detente in Europe. Ever since the beginning of 1980 repeated blows were delivered against the policy which dominated East-West relations during the past ten years known as "Ostpolitik" which was inaugurated by Willy Brandt. Afghanistan and Polish developments create a large cloud which is made thicker by the Near East crisis instead of diminishing. The dictatorship in Turkey falls within this entire framework. It was generally accepted by the West at a time when, after the dissolution of the dictatorships in Spain, Greece and Portugal the Europeans had sworn to prevent any resurrection of dictatorship within their own international organizations--NATO and the Council of Europe--including Turkey where everyone agreed that democracy was only a shadowy form. Under the light of imminent dangers to the progress of detente any uncertainty in the vital east Mediterranean area would create a void at a critical moment.

The fact, however, that the West speeded up reintegration--as an expert on Greek affairs mentioned in Brussels--ought to have allowed Greece to demand elemental sovereign exchanges and, most important, in view of the U.S. election Greece ought to have waited until after this election was held. This is because the new administration in Washington would have had every reason to present reintegration as its own achievement and consequently it would have been natural that it would have paid more attention to Greek positions. Specifically, there could have been discussion on the burning issue of the Aegean balance through implementation of military aid at the ratio in force until the beginning of the current year: five (to Turkey) and three (to Greece). As is known, the special West German aid to Turkey last June was 10 to 1, a fact which made the Greek Government refuse its own share. At the same time the United States also made it clear it will not continue the five to three ratio. Now, after reintegration, the Greek request for balance and a natural ratio passes into the sphere of wishful hoping. Also if negotiations were held with the new U.S. administration over reintegration then the request could have had tangible prospects of implementation at least in its simple relationship but in no case at the ratio of 10 to 1.

TURKMEN MEETS WITH MUSKIE, LUNS IN BRUSSELS

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen, who is in Brussels to participate in the NATO ministerial meeting, met separately with U.S. Secretary of State Edmund Muskie and NATO Secretary General Joseph Luns for talks. Various international issues and the latest developments in the Middle East were discussed and assessed during the talk between Turkmen and Muskie. Turkmen also briefed Muskie on Turkey's economic situation and military needs. Secretary of State Muskie told Turkmen that U.S. officials--led by President Carter--were closely aware of Turkey's needs and that were exerting all necessary efforts to meet these needs at the highest level.

International issues were reviewed during the meeting held between Turkmen and Luns.

EVREN, IRAQI MINISTER HOLD TALKS ON OIL SUPPLY

TA101119 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1000 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren again received the special representative of Iraqi President Saddam Husayn, Minister of Industry and Minerals Tahir Tawfiq, at the Cankaya Mansion at 0930 today. According to a statement issued on this subject by the Press and Public Relations Department of General Evren's office, the issue of the oil to be supplied by Iraq to Turkey both this year and in the future was discussed during the meeting. The statement noted that an agreement was reached to continue the detailed talks on the Iraqi oil supply to Turkey on the technical level. Evren held a meeting with the Iraqi minister yesterday as well.

LIBYAN MINISTER ARRIVES FOR ECONOMIC TALKS

[Text] Abu Zayd 'Umar Durdah, the minister of economy [title as heard] of the Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah, arrived in Ankara today. The visiting minister will participate in the sixth round of meetings of the joint Turkish-Libyan economic committee, which will begin its work in Ankara tomorrow.

OZAL ON RESULTS OF ECONOMIC STABILITY PROGRAM

[Excerpt] State and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal has said that the reduction of the annual rate of inflation to 40 percent and the increases in production, exports and workers' remittances demonstrate the success of the economic stability program. Addressing the meeting of the presidents of the Turkish Union of Chambers of Commerce, Industry and Stock Exchanges in Ankara today, Ozal noted that despite the twofold increase in world oil prices compared to last year, Turkey is now entering the winter period with full fuel tanks. Pointing out that significant foreign resources were secured through agreements signed in 1980 and that a very large operation of rescheduling of debts was realized, Ozal said that the revenue from Turkish workers' remittances will surpass $2 billion by the end of the (?year). Ozal noted that production decreased during the first 3 months of the year because of an oil shortage; however, it started increasing after May and especially after the 12 September operation.

Ozal added: The electricity shortage this year is not due to a lack of fuel oil. We now have fuel oil. Unfortunately, however, the capacity of existing power stations is not sufficient for the increasing industrial production. This in itself is the most important proof that production in Turkey has increased.

Noting that the positive effects of the economic stability program on exports have begun to become apparent since September, Ozal said that according to the interim November results, exports are 46 percent higher than in the same month last year. Pointing out that bank deposits have increased by 29 percent as a result of the new interest rate policy, Ozal said that the new tax reforms will further strengthen the stability program.

Ozal explained that the 1981 program and fiscal budget will organize the economy and give priority to services such as agriculture, energy, irrigation and ports. He also reiterated that solutions to all the economic problems could be attained within 4 or 5 years.

VOTCP WARNS AGAINST CONSEQUENCES OF NATO TALKS

TA101142 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Summary] "The administrative organs of the aggressive North Atlantic pact have begun their series of meetings at the NATO headquarters in Brussels. The main issues being discussed consist of the implementation of the decision made a year ago to deploy new U.S. nuclear missiles in Western Europe; the imposition of the new nuclear strategy of the United States on all the members of the bloc; the increase of pressure on all the NATO countries regarding the implementation of the decision to increase armament expenditures by at least 3 percent; the determination of the details of the long-term armament program, and the division of duties concerning the military actions outside NATO's sphere of influence."

The sale of old weapons by imperialist arms monopolies to Turkey, Portugal and Greece under the guise of modernizing these countries' armies will also be discussed within the framework of these main issues. Pressures will be increased to further mount armament expenditures in line with the NATO plan to strengthen the southeast flank of the alliance. In other words, NATO is attempting to enhance its moves to increase armament and nuclear armament in a bid to exacerbate international tension and undermine detente and peace."

"The consequences of the NATO meetings for Turkey and our people are already evident. New and heavy burdens will be imposed on our people." "The nature of the 1981 fiscal budget, which was ratified following continuing visits to Turkey by NATO ringleaders, constitutes the most concrete and horrifying proof of this consequence." The billions that are allocated to armament expenditures will be shouldered by the toiling masses. This policy of loyalty to imperialism is the primary cause of our economy's ruin, the threat posed to our people, the oppression and terrorism and the tortures.

"The imperialist countries and forces, who know that the junta relies on the power of the bayonet alone, want the loans they extend to Turkey to be used in increasing this power of the bayonet." The ministers and delegations of the junta attending the NATO meetings have received their orders to comply with U.S. pressures. The only reaction they are likely to display will be in the form of demanding more arms than Greece.

"In view of the fact that international imperialists have recently accelerated their attempts to mount the tension and their preparations for a nuclear war and that a junta which approves and lauds these moves is in power in our country, it is evident that the decisions to be made or ratified at the NATO meetings will pose great threats to regional peace and our national interests as well as to world peace." A massive struggle on the national level is the only way to avert this threat. Our people are in favor of severing ties with NATO, dismantling the foreign bases and tearing up the slavery agreements. "No junta or government which pursues this policy of loyalty to imperialism--that contradicts the primary wish of our people--can claim that it is based on the people. Such a junta or government cannot survive for long."

GENSCHER INTERVIEWED ON NATO TALKS ON POLAND

[Reporter Hauschild interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Last night the traditional talk on Germany took place between the U.S., French, British and West German foreign ministers. What did the stocktaking of inter-German relations reveal?

[Answer] We can state in this respect that these three countries support us in our efforts to see to it that the recent measures taken by the GDR aimed at reducing the number of visitors through the increase of the mandatory conversion rate are revoked, and I have no doubt that all the other NATO members also will have the courage to do so. All these talks have shown that the Germany policy of the Federal Government is firmly embedded in the agreement with all its Western allies that it is part of the common policy of the alliance's member states as well as the European Community's member states. It means that we do not make this policy in Germany and for Germany and for the Germans in both German states in isolation but with the support of our friends.

[Question] Reportedly the Polish issue also played a dominant role in the round of talks on Germany yesterday. How does the alliance assess the question at present as to whether the Soviet Union will or will not intervene in Poland?

[Answer] We will have an extensive discussion today on the situation in Europe and on East-West relations. As you said correctly, we also discussed developments in Poland yesterday within the scope of East-West relations. We agreed in this respect that the West should do everything in its power to show through its restraint that we pursue a policy of absolute and strict noninterference in the People's Republic of Poland and that we expect others to do the same.

[Question] But there seem to be apprehensions. The chairman of the NATO Military Committee, Canadian Admiral Robert Falls, said yesterday that he did not rule out the possibility of a Soviet invasion of Poland--I quote--also extending to and flooding the NATO area like a wave. Federal Defense Minister Apel tried to mitigate this assessment. Do we have to assume that there are differences of opinion in this respect among the alliance partners?

[Answer] [Words indistinct] I am not sure whether Admiral Falls has been understood correctly, because what colleague Apel said is a view shared by all alliance partners.

[Question] The NATO foreign ministers meeting begining today will agree on a catalogue of sanctions in case the Soviets march into Poland. We understand that U.S. Secretary of State Muskie in such a case will demand the discontinuation of the Vienna MBFR talks, the Madrid CSCE followup conference and all trade talks with the Soviets. Exploratory talks Washington also had in Bonn are said to have revealed that not all allies are willing to be nailed down to this catalogue of sanctions.

[Answer] To begin with, let me say that maintaining restraint also means that the alliance does not take any steps which might produce the impression as though the alliance considered events that may happen in Poland as being a fait accompli. This view also is shared by my colleagues, both the U.S., British and French colleagues. We will have a very responsible discussion today, with the most important goal being the ability of the alliance to bring about a unanimous stance of all our members on all important political problems. I consider this the central matter. It is the goal of the Federal Government. I have seen with great satisfaction that it also was the declared goal of my American, French and British colleagues yesterday.

Today we will make a detailed analysis of the situation, an analysis also of possible developments. I think the most important thing for us at the moment is to make it clear that the Western alliance has a common stance.

[Question] But does this proposal on a catalogue of sanctions exist?

[Answer] All possibilities will be discussed. We will discuss reactions to other events, and I am sure that all the member states will make their contribution.

[Question] One of the results of NATO's defense ministers meeting is the assessment by military experts that bigger arms efforts are necessary than the planned increase of military budgets by 3 percent in real terms. The Soviet defense minister announced yesterday that the Warsaw Pact would expand its defensive capability further. Doesn't this all have to be interpreted as the beginning of a new dimension of the arms race?

[Answer] You will remember that the Federal Government time and again has pointed out that we have reached a point which will decide whether the eighties will become a decade of the arms race or a decade of arms control and disarmament. We would prefer the latter alternative, but this requires cooperation by both sides.

The most important thing for the success of the policy preferred by us of arms control and disarmament is, however, that all Western states are determined to do what is necessary for our common security, including with regard to their defense efforts, because it is our goal to guarantee our security through the safeguarding of the balance of forces. We want this balance of forces to be achieved on the lowest possible level of armaments, but this requires cooperation by both sides. It is only the seriousness of our will to defend ourselves which will convince the other side--meaning the East--that it is reasonable to start arms control negotiations. This is why we have energetically backed the French proposal on a European disarmament conference.

This European disarmament conference is to create confidence-building measures for all of Europe, from the Atlantic to the Urals. Building of confidence--the possibility to really control military movements and efforts by the other side in order to be safe from surprise attacks--this building of confidence is an indispensable prerequisite of every effective arms control and any disarmament measures. It means that the alliance must show that it is agreed politically on its goals. It must show, second, that it is determined to do what is necessary for its security and, third, it does everything in its power to contribute towards arms control measures by advancing constructive proposals. I hope that these three clear objectives which serve to safeguard peace and the balance will emanate from this Brussels NATO meeting.

[Question] The report from India yesterday would also fit into this overall assessment--the report that Soviet state and party leader Brezhnev advanced a 5-point formula for a peace settlement in the Gulf region. The essential points of this doctrine, as this proposal should be termed, are the renunciation of military bases and of the deployment of nuclear arms in the Gulf region, the respect for the nonaligned status of the Gulf states and the freedom of trade routes. How does NATO assess Brezhnev's initiative?

[Answer] I don't think anybody should take the risk of assessing such proposals rashly. They have to be analyzed in detail, and then an assessment will be necessary. But one thing can now be said already. He who wants to make proposals for this region which guarantee its security, first of all should stop the occupation of Afghanistan, because it does not fit into the picture of the settlement of a region which is to be based on self-determination. And without self-determination there can be no solid peace settlement.

APEL ON MISSION OF AWACS PLANES, TORNADO ISSUES

DW111220 Hamburg ARD Television Network in German 2130 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Martin Schulze interview with Federal Defense Minster Hans Apel in Brussels--live or recorded]

[Text] [Schulze] This afternoon in Brussels the U.S. secretary of defense sought to describe the dispatch of the four reconnaissance planes to the Federal Republic as an almost standard procedure. He did concede, however, that this action may also be viewed in the context of the Polish situation. But these four planes may indeed cause trouble. The question is whether the Soviet Union will decide to interpret this additional surveillance of the Warsaw Pact states as a provocation, as a form of military espionage. This is exactly why NATO is making every effort to make this operation appear to be normal. It remains a fact nevertheless, and this also became plain in Brussels today, that the alliance intends to be better informed than heretofore about events in and around Poland.

[Question] May we conclude from this that our information about developments over there has been inadequate? Otherwise we would not need the planes.

[Answer] You cannot conclude this at all, but it is a foregone conclusion that freshly received radar data is different, better and more topical than a bit of information obtained otherwise.

[Question] You are not concerned at all that the Soviet Union might interpret this to be a military sign for a counterreaction?

[Answer] We held some detailed discussions here in NATO, and we said that we would avoid anything that might in any way lead to the vicinity of the military field. What I mean to say is that the alliance is a defense alliance and it is not its business to be concerned with matters that might transpire elsewhere, matters that hopefully will not transpire at all. But I think we owe it to ourselves and to our citizens to keep abreast of things, to know in good time how matters stand. I still remember the multitude of accusations raised a year ago when people said: Have you been sleeping?

Tornado Costs

DW111232 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2000 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Reporter Lothar Ruehl interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The cashboxes of the Federal Government and the alliances are as good as empty. How does one defend oneself in such a situation as well as one's budget and the programs one has decided on but which may have to be spread out?

[Answer] Certainly I am troubled. But I really think it is too early to say that matters can be solved in this way or that. There are various alternatives. You have mentioned one of them, the extension of the Tornado program. I have found out, by the way, that my Italian and British colleagues who build the Tornado plane together with us are equally troubled by this expensive arms system, although it is certainly a good one.

[Question] Can we say that the more parties involved in building such a plane, the more expensive it will be?

[Answer] One can certainly say that the cooperation of several countries in building a very complicated arms system, lasting for a decade, by the way, certainly does not save money. But it does entail simplification with regard to defense capability. That is worth a price.

It also adds some technical knowledge to the German aviation and space industries. It would certainly have been cheaper to buy things in America, but we would not have obtained this arms system. We would have lost many, many tens of thousands of jobs.

[Question] Does the SPD faction share your view?

[Answer] I gave a far-reaching report to the SPD faction yesterday. The faction is not an organ of acclamation for the minister, but I felt a great deal of solidarity yesterday. That is very important for a Social Democrat. He can be a defense minister only if he is supported by his fellow party members.

[Question] It can happen that along with developments in the international situation, new demands might be made in the alliance on the Federal Republic, such as a distribution of burdens. Can you imagine that we would be able to add anything to the current expenditures?

[Answer] Concretely speaking we were told: You Europeans must add something. We found out today that we are doing what we should do, so that we have no reason to be nervous at present. Developments may continue, and then new discussions will be necessary. But our NATO friends must know one thing: Every German mark can be spent only once, and the German taxpayer cannot be milked at will. So there are limits to everything, not least because it would be fatally dangerous to take a very narrow view of security policy, claiming that security is equal to defense. Social peace, social security and the outward continuation of our security policy are parts of the security policy in general.

[Question] Do you see a possibility of making all the money available that NATO and particularly the Americans expect from you in the years to come?

[Answer] Everything expected from me, expected also by the Bundeswehr, can certainly not be made available. One cannot prejudice cabinet discussions, but I believe that we must very seriously debate the security situation of the world and draw our conclusions.

[Question] And make more money available if need be?

[Answer] It would be a tactical error to tell this to the Federal Cabinet via television.

BOELLING COMMENTS ON APEL, AWACS, POLAND AID

DW111200 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West Germany
1210 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Correspondent Lenz interview with State Secretary Klaus Boelling, spokesman of the Federal Government, in Bonn--live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] During its routine Wednesday meeting the Federal Cabinet in Bonn today discussed a topic which presumably is on the agenda of any cabinet meeting, namely the discussion of the international situation. Before we discuss this any further let me say that the cabinet has at least two ministers who are the targets of criticism from the public and from their own parties, and for the sake of a fine balance they are each from one of the two coalition factions--Apel of the SPD and Ertl of the FDP. This is taking place in a general climate of murmuring and brooding in the coalition. To those who follow these things professionally it seems that part of this atmosphere rubs off on the cabinet; or does it remain completely unaffected by all this?

[Answer] Surely you do not expect me to answer your question in a way which you perhaps for journalistic reasons would like me to.

On the contrary, I have the impression--and I think there are plenty of journalistic, critical witnesses for this in Bonn and elsewhere--that what was described as a malady or complaint, after the government statement--Herbert Wehner said that it was not a light but only a lot of matches burning, which surely is a critical-ironic remark with a lot of meaning--has been overcome. They realize that it was impossible in the government statement to call for setting out for new shores. No, nothing of this complaint appeared at this cabinet meeting, and we are happy to note that the judgment of the government's work in the German press is beginning to gain a balance as well.

They discussed briefly the defense minister and the problem caused by the Tornado plane. You know that the chancellor in this respect backs the defense minister, not just because he is his fellow party member and a good personal friend besides, but because it is impossible here to make a person culpable. Minister Apel will draw all required conclusions. Presumably the cabinet will discuss the Tornado issue and the DM533 million next week.

As far as Federal Foods Minister Josef Ertl is concerned, he continues to enjoy the confidence of both the chancellor and the vice chancellor. There was no need at all to talk about him.

[Question] You believe, therefore, that the cabinet will most likely remain unchanged, at least for the foreseeable future?

[Answer] I ask you to proceed from that premise.

[Question] Let us discuss the international situation. NATO has asked the United States to dispatch four AWACS reconnaissance planes to Europe, that is, to Ramstein in the Federal Republic. From there they are supposed to observe through their reconnaissance eyes movements on Warsaw Pact territory. Can one interpret the NATO request, from the alliance's point of view, in some other way than as being an indication that the situation calls for reconnoitering or that it is threatening?

[Answer] Please do not consider this as window dressing by the government spokesman if I tell you that I believe your rather dramatic interpretation seems unfounded to me. You may recall that we discussed AWACS in the alliance years ago. At that time we not only mentioned that these planes were very expensive, demanding high contributions from the allies of the United States, we also viewed them from a political angle. I will say explicitly that we discussed it very briefly. We discussed it briefly because it is not a demonstrative gesture--this was said at the cabinet meeting--it is routine training and nothing else. NATO does not want to place a dramatic emphasis here.

[Question] The U.S. secretary of defense and his colleague, the secretary of state, have come to Brussels to today's NATO meeting with explicit directives as to what the United States expects from its allies in case of possible changes in Poland. Have these been announced or discussed by the cabinet?

[Answer] No, there was no need for it. It is natural for the Western alliance to discuss the situation, but I advise against making things appear dramatic. I believe that we agree with our allies that the West should in no case supply any pretexts to anybody for considering this or that. We will continue to follow this line, and we feel we are in full accord with our allied governments. We dealt, therefore, today in the cabinet with a humanitarian aspect, namely the foodstuff aid requested by the Government of the People's Republic of Poland. We discussed the issue of how the Community can comply with the wishes of the Polish Government for such foodstuff supplies. In accordance with a recent statement from Luxembourg by the European Council, the Federal Government has supported the idea that the necessary decisions should be made as soon as possible by the European Community. That is likely to come very soon. The Federal Government--this is the upshot of the cabinet session--the Federal Government on its part will see to it that the necessary credits will be available within the so-called economic framework, because these supplies must be paid for.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE SUPPORTS AWACS PRESENCE

[Commentary signed Me.: "View as far as Poznan"]

[Text] It is not even the sophisticated technical capabilities of the "AWACS" planes which constitute their best feature; it has been generally known since their dispatch to the crisis area on the Persian Gulf 2 months ago that they can assume a political signal mission in addition to their military reconnaissance and guidance mission. Four such American planes let the two warring parties, Iran and Iraq, know that the U.S. world power is watching their doings with concern and interest alike. The same signal is now being conveyed to the Soviet Union by another four "AWACS" planes now that the defense ministers of the North Atlantic pact have requested their dispatch in view of the possibility of drastic Soviet measures against Poland. The planes do not constitute a threat nor even an enhancement of military readiness; at best the Soviet Union could complain about "espionage" flights if it deems this to be an impressive charge in the era of surveillance satellites. The option of henceforth seeing from Hannover to Poznan or from Bornholm to Lodz is tranquilizing in every respect. And this time Soviet political pressure on individual members of the alliance--perhaps because of the reconnaissance flights over the Baltic Sea--stands no chance because all of the defense ministers in the alliance requested the planes.

INVESTMENT AGREEMENT WITH ROMANIA RATIFIED

[Text] Bonn, 11 Dec (DPA)--The investment promotion agreement between the FRG and Romania signed in October 1979 can come into force 10 January. Hans Werner Lautenschlager, state secretary at the Foreign Ministry, and Ion Radu, the Romanian ambassador in Bonn, exchanged the ratification documents on Thursday, according to a Foreign Ministry statement.

The agreement serves the protection of capital investments under international law; it contains provisions for protection against expropriation; it assures the free transfer of capital and profits and envisages provision for arbitration in case of differences of opinion. The investment climate should thus be improved and the incentive for private capital investments intensified. According to the Foreign Ministry, this is the first agreement of this kind between the FRG and a country with a state-owned trading system.

DIE WELT SKEPTICAL ABOUT SOVIET PLAN FOR GULF

DW121035 Bonn DIE WELT in German 12 Dec 80 p 6

[Text] The Soviet "peace plan" for the Persian Gulf region, outlined by Breshnev in India, reminds one of a strange Moscow practice: Wherever the Soviets have their foot in the door, they present such a peace plan. Such plans have been in existence for a long time for Europe--CSCE was originally scheduled by the Kremlin to be a meeting under Soviet chairmanship without the Americans. Similar considerations also exist with a view to eastern Asia--and now also for a part of the Near East.

Foreign military bases are supposed to be reduced. But how about the socialist achievements of the People's Republic of Yemen or of Ethiopia--just to name two examples from the field of closer neighborliness? The whole thing reminds one of the game Khrushchev played with Kennedy. Kennedy once described the Soviet stance by saying that Moscow maintains the standpoint: "What is mine (meaning Soviet) is mine--but what is yours is negotiable."

GISCARD DISCUSSES POLAND WITH USSR AMBASSADOR

[Text] In connection with the Polish crisis the 15 foreign ministers of the Atlantic alliance who met behind closed doors in Brussels have decided to take joint drastic political and economic measures against Moscow in case of a Soviet intervention in Poland, thus falling into step with the catalogue of measures envisaged yesterday by Washington. In any case, Jean Francois-Poncet considers that Western stances were marked by a wide consensus.

In the meantime the Soviet ambassador to Paris was being received by Valery Giscard d'Estaing at the Elysee. Stepan Chervonenko tried to be reassuring. He even went as far as to state that Polish officials and people would be able to resolve their problems themselves.

LE MONDE CONSIDERS OPTIONS OPEN TO POLAND

[Andre Fontaine article: "A Wider Rubicon Than in 1968"]

[Excerpt] The Polish Communists are planning to hold an extraordinary congress next March or April. The line which it is likely to take could well determine the final verdict given by Moscow and its "hardline" Prague and East Berlin allies on the future of the present experiment. In this case it is the line officially laid down and the composition of the leadership bodies which are likely to increase the Kremlin's apprehensions, since the process of radical renewal already underway at grassroots level in Polish Communist Party organizations is highly likely to strongly contradict the principles and, even more, the practice dear to the Soviets.

It is true that in many respects Poland's present situation is very different from the one which led to the invasion of Czechoslovakia, not to mention the invasion of Hungary 12 years earlier. In both cases the party itself defied Moscow. In Budapest Imre Nagy went so far as to include representatives of the bourgeois parties in his government, to withdraw Hungary from the Warsaw Pact and to proclaim its neutrality. The Czechoslovak party's new draft rules published in August 1968 omitted any reference to the sacred principle of "democratic centralism." Dubcek had made the mistake of receiving Tito and Ceausescu, both of whom were given a triumphant welcome. One general—who was immediately disavowed—went so far as to advocate a "Romanian path" for foreign policy. Too many Americans and Germans had visited Prague.

In Poland's case, however, at least so far, the party leaders are not only repeating from morning to night their loyalty to the Warsaw Pact but are not showing any ideological deviation in their speeches. The Central Committee has stepped up its warnings to those who might be tempted to take advantage of the situation, while in Hungary and Czechoslovakia the party had allowed itself to be carried away by the wave of freedom which rose from the depths of the nation. During its last plenum the Central Committee introduced a number of "hardliners" into the leadership bodies who are determined not to allow socialist structures to be called into question. It was moreover, the Central Committee spokesman who mentioned on 4 December the possibility of an appeal to the "fraternal" countries.

The fact that the party is not allowing itself to be undermined does not, however, mean that it is doing what it wants. It gave up trying to do that a long time ago. From this viewpoint, too, contemporary Poland's history is entirely different from that of Hungary and Czechoslovakia. In those two countries we witnessed a brief explosion and a heady freedom which led to a brutal Soviet reaction. In Budapest party First Secretary Janos Kadar, who had been detained for 5 years and tortured by the Stalinists, agreed to back the invaders. By doing that he succeeded in making his country the most tolerable socialist camp country to live in, while trying to ensure that as little is said about it as possible. In Prague, however, there is once again a protectorate. The two cases are similar, however, in that the party's preeminence is in no way called into question.

In Poland we have not witnessed one explosion but a whole series--1956 (Poznan riots and Gomulka's return), 1970 (riots in Gdynia and Gdansk, Gomulka's replacement by Gierek) and 1980 being only the main ones--in the context of a process of growing differentiation from the Soviet model. "Naked women (in night clubs--Fontaine note) and full churches, and you call that socialism!" Mrs Furtseva, Soviet culture minister in Khrushchev's day, remarked on her return from a trip to Warsaw. She could have added "and kulaks," since three-fourths of Polish agriculture, as everybody knows, still consists of family farms.

The Soviets have not only had to grow accustomed to the fact that intellectual life in Poland follows norms which are regarded as petit bourgeois deprevation in their country, and to the fact that there is no country in the Christian world where religious practice is so extensive. Since 1970, above all, they have had to accept a de facto power sharing between the party and the church. In fact they do not have much reason to complain about that. Who is preaching patience and moderation to the Poles today if not the cardinal primate, strongly supported in this course of action by the pope, and Lech Walesa who, to say the least, makes no secret of his religious convictions and his ecclesiastical friendships?

Nonetheless they are bound to observe that, far from stopping the erosion of the party's power is continuing. For years now articles in "clandestine" newspapers have been signed with their authors' real names. Clubs and movements which directly attack the regime's taboos--notably the official version of events like the German-Soviet pact, the Katyn massacre, the Warsaw uprising--operate in the open.

Now, alongside the chruch's de facto power which calls the party's monopoly into question, another has emerged which stems from the grassroots and which really speaks on the people's behalf. In principle the Solidarity movement is a purely trade union movement. However, its demands are constantly intruding into the political sphere: it is Solidarity which has obtained the broadcasting of Sunday mass on the radio and a reduction in press censorship. The consolidation of such an exception to the general practice of communist regimes implies, at least ultimately, a danger of extension to neighboring countries which Moscow, and to a greater extent East Berlin and Prague, cannot contemplate gladly. Therefore it is highly probable that, in different circumstances, the Warsaw Pact gendarmes would already have intervened to restore "order in Warsaw."

The fact that they have not done so as yet, after repeated warnings and the sound of marching feet, and the fact that Mr Brezhnev who, at the Dresden summit in 1968 refused Dubcek any economic aid, has recently opened extensive credit to Mr Kania can be attributed to a series of reasons which readily come to mind.

The first is, without doubt, the fact that it is Poland which is in question--in other words a country with 35 million inhabitants who have patriotism and the spirit of resistance in their blood. In 1968 the Czechoslovaks, unlike the Hungarians in 1956, did not for a moment contemplate armed resistance. In Poland, everybody is convinced that not only the army but the people would fight if there were an invasion. It is true that the Soviet and allied forces would have overwhelming superiority but, once the pitched battle was over, the Poles could be relied upon to make life very difficult for the occupiers. The best way in which the Soviet marshals can ensure the security of their lines of communication with the GDR is, therefore, not necessarily to try to subjugate Poland by military means. Afghanistan is teaching them every day that the steamroller's efficiency is limited when it encounters a determined nation.

The second reason is that the Kremlin needs detente because it is in a difficult economic situation. It needs Western credit, grain and technology as well as a strategic arms limitation agreement. That is why Senator Percy was so well received at the Kremlin and why the Moscow summit communique contains a clear overture to Mr Reagan. However, it goes without saying, as Chancellor Kreisky said in an interview to DIE WELT, that it would be unthinkable to talk about detente after an invasion of Poland.

Therefore at the present juncture there are some grounds for thinking that the Soviets will only intervene if they really cannot avoid it--in other words, if the Polish state and party, to quote the Warsaw Central Committee spokesman's own words, lose control of the situation. It largely depends on the Poles themselves--and Mr Brzezinski himself has just called on them to show caution and compromise--whether or not their big Eastern bloc "friends" will be forced into such extreme measures. In other words, having probably obtained as much as is possible at present, they must clearly show their desire to put the country and its economy back on the rails as quickly as possible.

L'HUMANITE ON 'CAMPAIGN OF DECEPTION' ON POLAND

LD111721 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 6 Dec 80 pp 1, 7

[Rene Andrieu editorial: "The Deception Continues"]

[Text] I wrote the other day that the campaign of deception about the imminence of a Soviet military intervention in Poland stemmed from the United States.

Justice must be done to all the radio and television networks and most newspapers in our dear old country: not content with following the trend they have moved into the front line.

Despite denials from the Soviet and the Poles (government and trade union leaders), despite the convenient climbdown by the Americans, they are still calmly announcing that Soviet tanks are at Warsaw's gates.

The Soviet authorities' categorical denials are, or course, completely disregarded.

However, even Mr Brzezinski, Mr Carter's adviser for international questions and a known anit-Sovietist, stated Thursday that it was important "not to adopt a near-hysterical attitude in this affair," that, according to him, intervention is "neither inevitable nor imminent," and that "realistic minds" in Moscow, Washington and Warsaw did not want a confrontation.

Even the Pentagon, which can no more be suspected of pro-Soviet sympathies than Mr Brzezinski can, took the trouble to say that no steps have been taken by the U.S. Armed Forces.

Even the Foreign Office in London stated that it does not "foresee any Soviet intervention in Poland."

That is not preventing the major sections of the media from pursuing their campaign, on the basis of any rumor, interpreting remarks out of context, even scrutinizing what is left unsaid and not hesitating, if necessary, to simply distorting the facts.

The press conference given Thursday by Polish United Workers' Party spokesman Jozef Klasa was portrayed almost unanimously as confirmation that the Soviets are going to intervene, whereas it pointed to exactly the opposite, since it stressed the fact that the Polish Communists are capable of controlling the situation and overcoming the crisis.

Yesterday on Radio Europe 1, for the 2d day running, Ivan Levai distorted what L'HUMANITE had said, while Christine Ockrent, who piously passes on any false report provided it is anticommunist, asserted that the Soviet leaders had taken a decision on an "invasion" last Thursday. Sincerity is being confused with accuracy.

Some people do not hesitate to indulge in audiovisual deception to dramatize the event and stir up opinion against the USSR. For instance, during the evening of the day before yesterday, the television showed pictures of Soviet tanks--pictures which are several years old--and yesterday morning Radio Europe 1 spoke at length about this sequence which, Philippe Gildas told us twice in the space of 1 minute, is likely to make the viewers "tremble."

Thus all reporters are taking up positions and contributing to "the organized dramatization of the Polish crisis," as LE MONDE's correspondent in Warsaw writes, seriously attributing this dramatization to Jozef Klasa's remarks. As if most of the media, including LE MONDE, had been waiting for this press conference before starting their campaign! According to this newspaper, which does not fear contradiction, it does not matter that "the internal Polish situation is probably calmer now than it has been since August." It does not matter that a Solidarity trade union leader in Warsaw told Radio Luxembourg yesterday that "the atmosphere in Poland is not in the least like the way that Western newspapers and programs portray it." It does not matter that the same union's national leadership considers, according to AFP, that "there are at present no strikes or protest actions" in Poland and that there are "no grounds" for "alarmist feelings."

This is not the first time that the media has indulged in such things. When Tito died, a similar campaign developed. We are publishing overleaf the headline which LE PARISIEN LIBRE published yesterday ["Warsaw After Budapest and Prague?] and the one it published when Tito was ill ["Tito's SOS to Carter"]. LE MATIN for its part frontpaged the following headline yesterday: "The Polish Communist Party Might Call on the Soviets." On 16 January it carried the headline: "Russian Tanks at Iran's Gates." L'AURORE (31 January 1980) wrote: "After Afghanistan, Yugoslavia." LE FIGARO magazine carried the headline: "Ten Million Yugoslavs Ready To Fight." LE QUOTIDIEN DE PARIS (21 February 1980) wrote: "Yugoslavia at the Soviets' Mercy." FRANCE-SOIR (30 January 1980) wrote: "Soviets Ready To Launch War Because of Oil Shortage." And so forth.

The list could be continued indefinitely, because the press and radio and television are inexhaustible when it comes to anti-Soviet propaganda.

It is true that, although a military intervention by the USSR seems out of the question--it would only make things worse--the situation in Poland remains difficult. However, it is up to the Poles and them alone to overcome it. Their leaders think they have the means of so doing, and the other Warsaw Pact countries, meeting in Moscow yesterday, said they shared that conviction. It would be better to help achieve such a solution without ulterior motives than to pour fat on the fire as some people are doing. They are probably doing this because they hope that, by brandishing the threat of an imaginary intervention, they will be able to say in future that the war did not take place thanks to the West's strong warnings. However, it is always dangerous to play with fire.

RINASCITA EDITOR CITES PCI STAND ON POLAND

[Text] There was a long discussion yesterday at the PCI headquarters in Via Delle Botteghe Obscure between PCI Secretary Enrico Berlinguer and Brezhnev's personal representative, Vadim Zagladin. The subject was the Polish question and the attitude of the PCI toward a Soviet armed intervention, which in any case has already been illustrated in a letter sent by the party directorate to fraternal parties in East Europe, threatening a break in relations in the event of an intervention by the Red Army.

At the end of the discussion a curt communique was issued in which the profound divergence between the two positions is obvious. Berlinguer described as unacceptable even the threat of an invasion, and while neither of the two openly mentioned a rupture, the irreconcilability of their positions is clearly evident. Here is an interview by Pietro Buttita on the PCI'S stance at this delicate stage of the Polish crisis:

[Begin recording] [Buttita] The weekly RINASCITA has published a wide-ranging article entitled "(?Blind Alley)" by Editor Luciano Barca on the situation in Poland. It constitutes an important contribution to the discussion on the relationship between socialism and freedom and even further on political and trade union rights in a socialist regime. I put several questions to Luciano Barca on Poland and on the significance of the fears, but also the debate, which the Polish crisis has triggered off throughout the world.

[Question] The process underway in Poland is judged in your editoral to be of the sort to revive the ideals and values of socialism. This is a view very different from the views that have appeared in the last few days in the Soviet, Czechoslovak and GDR press. From where does this diversity stem?

[Answer] From the outset we expressed a positive judgment of the attitude adopted by the Polish party with regard to the strikes, the movements of the working class, and we consider that each party has as its first duty that of taking into account the party-people relationship, its own society and the working class. [passage indistinct]

[Question] Are you not of the opinion that your statements and those made by your party might result in a possibly irreversible divergence between the positions of the PCI and those of the parties in power in East Europe?

[Answer] [passage indistinct] These positions have already brought about a divergence and the establishing of the fact that differences exist. I personally hope that these may lead to a fertile discussion uninterrupted by traumatic events.

[Question] The condition is, you write, that Poland should be allowed to develop its positive renovating process and that no attempt be made on any part to interfere in the choice made by the Polish people. Do you also believe that the interference threatening Poland could go beyond the political pressures which we are already registering? In a word, Mr Barcal, is there a fear that what happened in Prague could also happen in Warsaw?

[Answer] I first and foremost stressed the extreme gravity of the Polish situation, because we are faced with an extremely acute economic situation, in which there is a shortage of some essential food supplies; and we are faced, as I have stressed in my article, with the interlacing of hopes and fears, all of which naturally represent extremely difficult questions for the Polish United Workers Party and very difficult problems for the trade unions, for Solidarity. I fervently hope that everyone's sense of responsibility results in a positive collaboration which would prevent these problems and difficulties from provoking sparks and incidents that might drive certain parties and certain countries to acts of pressure and [word indistinct]

These are already underway because there are interferences, in fact. Naturally, there are also interferences by the West. However, we are faced with other interferences by countries which are opposed to experimentation; instead of everyone helping, it could end with a (?renunciation) of a socialism which [words indistinct] fully reconciles itself with the democratic movement and with the sense of (?autonomy). This is the problem involved. [passage indistinct] [end recording]

NOVOYE VREMYA EDITOR RETICENT ON POLISH ISSUE

[Text] Introducing in Rome the Italian edition of the Soviet magazine NOVOYE VREMYA, Mikhail Fedorov, who is its editor-in-chief, carefully avoided answering the questions put to him by journalists who asked him to give his opinion on the state of the relations between the Soviet Communist Party and the Italian Communist Party.

On the Polish situation, too, Fedorov showed himself to be very evasive so as to avoid, he said, a (?misunderstood) sentence triggering off (?mistaken ideas) concerning the true intentions of the Soviet Union.

The editor of NOVOYE VREMYA, who has frequently published harsh criticism of the position of the Italian Communists, repeatedly made references to Italy's foreign policy, accusing Italy of having accepted without discussion the presence of missiles with nuclear warheads on its territory.

The PCI Directorate at its meeting today heard the report made by Gian Carlo Pajetta and Antonio Rubbi on the results of their meetings with Polish leaders. The Directorate approved these (?initiatives) and confirmed that the PCI would continue along its own line.

COLOMBO SEES RISKS TO USSR IN POLAND INTERVENTION

[Text] Brussels Dec 12 KYODO--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo Friday told Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito, here to attend a meeting of the Foreign Minister's Council of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), that he believed the United States was too pessimistic about the situation in Poland. At the outset of the conference held between the two foreign ministers, Ito expressed his sympathy in connection with the recent disastrous earthquake in southern Italy and handed the Italian foreign minister a check for $1 million as part of Japan's emergency aid. He also extended an official invitation to Italian President Alessandro Pertini to visit Japan.

Taking up the turbulent situation in Poland, Colombo declared that all the efforts to ease tension, maintain the security of Europe and reduce armaments would be nullified if the Soviet Union intervened militarily in Poland. He also said that the defense structure of the West European nations would be seriously affected in such an event because Soviet troops would be deployed in an area near the West German border of East Germany.

At the same time, however, Colombo said that he believed the United States was too pessimistic about preventing Soviet intervention in Poland because the Soviet Union knew it would have to pay a high price and run great risks if it did so. The Italian foreign minister also said that concrete measures aimed at the Soviet Union if it does intervene in Poland have been studied at the ambassadorial level by NATO countries. He added that these measures will be both political and economic.

ADOLFO SUAREZ REFUSES TO NEGOTIATE WITH ETA

[Excerpt] San Sebastian--Prime Minister Suarez's activities in San Sebastian are about to end. After the press conference held with representatives of the media, Adolfo Suarez met with the Basque "lendakri" [president] Carlos Garaikoetxea, with whom he is still having talks. The press conference centered on the problems of the Basque country and on the results of the prime minister's visit. Political negotiations, nuclear power stations, economic agreements and the autonomous police force were also discussed.

Asked about negotiation with the ETA organization to contribute to the pacification of the Basque country, the prime minister replied:

[Begin recording] I have expressed my opinion on this several times. I will not negotiate with ETA. I have said this several times and I think, moreover, that this is not a path which can and should be followed. You cannot negotiate with people who are continually committing murders. Once again I reiterate this point. The pacification of the Basque country is an aim which the Spanish Government wants, which the great majority of the Basque people want and which the great majority of Spaniards want. This will be achieved in the dimensions of time which such a grave problem as this demands. But, clearly, it has to be pursued not only by means of police measures, but also by political, economic and cultural measures, among others--in short, by developing in depth the statute of autonomy. This is the path which we are following and the path which we are going to follow. [end recording]

SPAIN TO PROTEST XINHUA ITEM ON CEUTA, MELILLA

LD102238 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 2000 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Text] The Spanish Embassy in Beijing has prepared a note of protest to the Chinese Government over a piece of news put out by the official XINHUA on Ceuta and Melilla. The news item said that Ceuta and Melilla are two Moroccan cities occupied by Spain which have been transformed into Spanish military bases. The Spanish Embassy in Beijing points out that Ceuta and Melilla are two Spanish cities which were incorporated into the Spanish crown in the 15th century long before Spain achieved its national unity in 1492. Both cities, the communique adds, have Spanish populations. Therefore, it is improper to talk of the recovery of the territory on the part of Morocco since Ceuta and Melilla have never been Moroccan, because Morocco did not exist when the cities were incorporated into Spain.

PSOE LEADER ON EL SALVADOR, VISIT TO CUBA, U.S.

PA111750 Madrid EFE in Spanish 1027 GMT 10 Dec 80

[Text] Madrid, 10 Dec (EFE)--U.S. public opinion has been traumatized by the current situation in El Salvador, Felipe Gonzalez, secretary general of the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSOE], the major political force of the opposition, has stated on returning from his visit to Cuba, Panama and the United States.

In his opinion, attempts are underway to provoke an anticipated insurrection in order to smash it, and this has created a difficult situation not only in El Salvador but in the entire area.

The impression of the PSOE secretary general regarding the current situation in El Salvador is that "it is a terrible situation. Following Reagan's election as U.S. president and considering that he does not take office until 20 January, a number of positions have been unleashed, above all from the ultraright, seeking to create a de facto situation before Reagan takes power."

In Panama Felipe Gonzalez met with members of the Socialist International with whom he discussed, among other topics, Eurosocialism, the current situation in North America and the problems in Central America. In the United States the Spanish Socialist leader attended a meeting of the Institute of Socialist and Democratic Investigation.

Regarding his meeting with Fidel Castro, the Spanish Socialist leader said that he discussed with him the international situation, especially in the Caribbean area. He said that they spoke in general terms "without searching for a specific result, but to exchange views and opinions on solutions to the problems of peace."

Regarding the rumors of a possible support by the Cuban Government to the Spanish terrorist group "ETA," Felipe Gonzalez affirmed that these are totally false and that he does not believe such a hypothesis is worth consideration.

"The fact is," he said, "that Fidel Castro is thankful to Spain, because this was a country which did not participate in the isolation to which Cuba was submitted. Therefore relations are good and, of course, they are not going to be tainted by this situation."

Concluding, the PSOE secretary general said that during this trip he confirmed once more that there is more confidence in foreign countries in the political and economic evolution of Spain than there is in this country and that, despite the difficulties faced everyday by Spain, "when the situation is viewed from outside, it can be seen that the country has changed and that the democratic process is gaining a foothold."

CARRINGTON ON EUROPEAN MIDEAST INITIATIVE

[Excerpts] London—At a press conference for Arab journalists, including an ASH-SHARQ AL-AWSAT correspondent, British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington reviewed the EC efforts since the Venice conference to bring about a European initiative to solve the Middle East problem.

Lord Carrington said that the EC council of foreign ministers decided following Gaston Thorn's tour and his talks with the parties concerned to draft four "papers" regarding self-determination (for the Palestinians), Israeli withdrawal, security, and Jerusalem. He said that the self-determination "papers" deals, for example, with questions like: "What does the right to self-determination mean? There are Palestinians everywhere. How many of them will be allowed to return and over how long a time, and so forth." The British foreign secretary said that the questions that these papers raise will be used to sound the views of the parties concerned regarding the Middle East crisis, in accordance with a decision taken by the EC foreign ministers council at its meeting last week.

Lord Carrington denied that Britain is procrastinating and prevaricating in finalizing the European initiative. Replying to a remark to this effect, he said: "I assure you that we are not procrastinating but us—that is the Europeans—always have believed that this process cannot be finished in just two seconds. I assure you that I am not behind any delay. It was the French who proposed this particular operation (that is, to find out the views of the parties concerned and then finalize a plan of action)." Lord Carrington said that the Dutch will make a survey of the views, but will do so in consultation with the rest of the EC foreign ministers.

Lord Carrington was asked: "Don't you think that Gaston Thorn's reports were sufficient (to let you know the views of the parties concerned)?" He replied: "I believe that his reports covered the general principles but I imagine that the talks held by the Dutch will be more detailed."

Lord Carrington was asked whether "tangible" measures will be delayed until the nature of the new U.S. administration is known, particularly after what is being said about a Jordanian "alternative," or until after the Israeli general elections are held. He said:

"I believe that what Europe will do is go ahead regardless of those factors. Obviously it will be affected by those factors but it will proceed. So far we do not know what the policy of the new U.S. president is going to be, but Europe will go forward, and we will be consulting with the Americans.

Lord Carrington was asked: "Did you discuss at the Brussels summit the role that the PLO should play?" He replied: "We have made it clear that the PLO must be in touch with any negotiations. Thorn has met with the PLO and so will Van der Klaauw. We too will meet the PLO at the Arab-European dialogue."

SECURITY COUNCIL EXTENDS UN FORCE MANDATE

NC120839 Nicosia Domestic Service in English 0630 GMT 12 Dec 80

[Text] The UN Security Council has decided by 14 votes to nil to extend the mandate of the UN force in Cyprus for another 6 months, up to 15 June. China did not participate in the vote.

The secretary general, Mr Waldheim, told the Council that the force, which has been on the island since 1964, retained its indispensable function of maintaining calm in the island while its Greek and Turkish communities attempt to reach a peaceful settlement.

The Council resolution noted with satisfaction the resumption of intercommunal peace talks in the island and urged the two communities to pursue these talks in a continuing, sustained and result-oriented manner, avoiding any delay. Mr Waldheim was urged by the Council to continue his mission of good offices in bringing the two sides together.

Cyprus' permanent representative to the United Nations, Mr Mavrommatis, told the Council that extension of UNFICYP's mandate was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of a peaceful climate on the island, conducive to reaching a settlement of the Cyprus problem. While some progress had been made in a limited area of the talks, Mr Mavrommatis said, the chasm between the two sides was as large as at the start of the talks. He said there had been no tangible progress on matters of substance. Meanwhile, he added, the Greek Cypriot side was arming itself with a large stock of patience and good will. The Cypriot representative also expressed the hope that ways and means would be found during the talks to learn the fates of some 2,000 Greek Cypriots and Greeks reported missing since the 1974 invasion of the island.

The Greek ambassador, Mr Katapodis, described the resumption of the intercommunal talks as a hopeful development. It is very important, he said, to ensure a fresh start.

The Turkish ambassador, Mr Kirca, endorsed the extension of the mandate as did Mr Atalay, the Turkish Cypriot, who spoke at the invitation of the Security Council. Atalay also said that the Turkish community would do everything possible to help Mr Waldheim in order to achieve positive and constructive results in the Cyprus talks.

On his way back, Mr Rolandhis will visit London in order to participate in President Kiprianou's talks with British Prime Minister Thatcher.

O ACON: NATO DUTYBOUND TO INTERVENE IN CYPRUS

NC120924 Nicosia O ACON in Greek 12 Dec 80 p 2

[From the "Our Positions" column; NATO and the Cyprus Question]

[Text] NATO Secretary General Luns maintains that it is not up to the alliance to solve the Cyprus question. NATO, however, is dutybound to contribute to the solution of the Cyprus question--and moreover to a just solution--if nothing else at least for its own interests. It is NATO that created the Cyprus problem. One of its member countries that enjoys its support invaded Cyprus and occupied 40 percent of its territory. For years this has disrupted NATO's entire southeastern wing.

Mr Luns himself admits that the Cyprus question is a vital point in Greek-Turkish relations; and it will continue to remain a vital point, with unforeseeable dangers, if it is left pending or if it is solved in a way that would not guarantee permanence and stability. Consequently, NATO must contribute to a just solution of the problem. It has all the capabilities for doing so.

DENKTAS CALLS UN DECISION ON CYPRUS REALISTIC

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that the UN General Assembly decision not to discuss the Cyprus problem is a positive one. He added that the decision to remove the Cyprus issue from the agenda would contribute to the continuation of the intercommunal talks in a favorable atmosphere. Denktas said: The UN General Assembly acted realistically. We hope that the Greek Cypriot leadership will start to act with the same realism.

O ACON ON POSSIBLE DENKTAS REMOVAL BY ANKARA

[Text] The military government in Ankara will decide in the next few days whether to remove Denktas or keep him in the leadership of the Turkish Cypriot administration with restricted authority. According to our information, the Ankara military council will hold an extraordinary meeting next week which will exlusively discuss the Cypriot issue and Ankara's stand toward Denktas who has refused to accept certain proposals on the Cypriot issue.

The Turkish Cypriot leader has threatened to resign in the event the military government deprives him of some jurisdictions, and he would not permit any military or other person from Ankara to exercise control over him. According to our information, the Turkish Cypriot leader is trying to cut off the intercommunal talks while Turkey's military leaders hold the opposite view. Despite the Cypriot Government's intentions to implement the rapprochement measures, particularly the measures on granting pension to Turkish Cypriots, Denktas is ruining these efforts under various pretexts and excuses. The Cypriot Government has requested that all Turkish Cypriots entitled to a pension should submit evidence that they are alive and initiate personal contact with the competent government officials. However, Denktas refuses to allow any contact.

TERCUMAN URGES RESTRAINT ON MILITARY REGIME

NC120853 Istanbul TERCUMAN in Turkish 9 Dec 80 pp 1, 12

[Editorial by Nazli Ilicak: "Legality"]

[Excerpts] We do not believe in the need to vilify the political parties, the parliament, the politicians and the actions of the previous administration in order to prove the legality of the military operation [on 12 September]. This is because responsibility is so widespread that it will not be easy to trace the true culprit in an intermingled community involving universities, the press, the high courts, and even some martial law officials.

Legality stems from the pre-12 September state crisis and the success of the military operation. Had the circumstances not prepared a favorable ground and had it been possible to leave the door ajar for an exit from the crisis, the military intervention would not have materialized, because the Turkish Armed Forces do not emulate the example of the Latin American countries where coups occur in rapid succession. True, the army has the final say in politics... when it speaks, others have to keep silent. But its ultimate aim is not to seize the state but to terminate the state crisis.

The honorable prime minister has issued a communique under No 2-4/00104 to the ministers, asking for information "regarding the acts of injustice and corruption committed up to today" and adding that the information in question would be brought to the knowledge of the public and the press. The prime minister further stated in the communique that the samples in the dossiers "would testify to the fact that the operation was unavoidable."

Such a practice is bound to disturb consciences. Had the "unjust gains and abuses" dossier of the 27 May revolution proved at all convincing?

While the Turkish people uphold the Turkish Armed Forces they also support their parties and their party members. If the process of "calling to account" is widened to the extent of blowing up all the bridges to the politicians and their cadres, this will render transition to democracy very difficult.

The escalating anarchy, the idle parliament and the unstable governments of the pre-12 September era are still fresh in our memories. It is this sad picture that lies at the foundation of the military intervention. Is it not advisable to avoid loitering in blind alleys while trying to render democracy operable again?

The successful implementation of 12 September without causing damage to its image will ease the way to returning democracy. With this in mind, we also wish to criticize the present practice at Mamak. Only one newspaper [MILLIYET] was allowed access to the Mamak military prison which provided an illustrated description of the life of the convicts.

We have learned from this illustrated report that the detainees are made "to trot," to learn by heart passages from Ataturk's great speech, and to run while listening or singing marches.

Propaganda is a delicate art. If the report on the Mamak prison was undertaken for propaganda purposes, this purpose has not been achieved, for the prison practice described will be considered repugnant by the Western world. Turkey is going through an extraordinary period. We may think that the military administration which has assumed duty under these difficult conditions is entitled to implement methods which it deems fit for the purpose of establishing discipline. If that is the case, is it not advisable to refrain from "proudly" presenting certain repugnant aspects of this practice?

It is always possible to be confronted with the danger of obtaining completely wrong results while searching for legality, righteousness and support.

FINNISH FOREIGN MINISTER ON CSCE CONFERENCE, POLAND

LD131045 Helsinki International Service in English 0930 GMT 13 Dec 80

[Text] The Finnish foreign minister, Mr Paavo Vayrynen, currently on an official visit to Austria, has said that the contributions of Finland and Austria in international cooperation are an example of the fact that neutrality does not mean passivity. Addressing a banquet in Vienna, hosted by the Austrian Foreign Minister, Willibald Pahr, Mr Vayrynen also stressed Finnish-Austrian bilateral cooperation and cooperation with other neutral and nonaligned countries.

The Finnish foreign minister said that the CSCE process has given Finland and Austria the possibility of pursuing their own interests and of contributing to bringing about a wider international understanding amongst the participants of the CSCE. In Mr Vayrynen's words, it is encouraging that the CSCE followup is now underway in Madrid as planned despite the present difficulties. The Finnish foreign minister assured that this country would do her part so that a solution satisfying all participants could be arrived at in Madrid.

Finland and Austria agree on the need for continuing the followup of the CSCE. This was stressed in the talks between Mr Vayrynen and his Austrian counterpart on Friday. On Friday Mr Vayrynen also met Federal President Rudolf Kirchschlaeger and Chancellor Bruno Kreisky. It was also stressed in the talks between the foreign ministers that the views of Finland and Austria on international politics are largely parallel. According to Mr Vayrynen, there are at the most slight differences of interpretation.

On the Polish situation, the Finnish foreign minister said that this country's attitude is perhaps slightly more reserved than Austria's, but that it is not a question of actual differences of opinion. The Finnish and Austrian foreign ministers [words indistinct] that the neutral and nonaligned countries should intensify their cooperation in the present international situation. Both stressed at the same time that this must not lead to the formation of a new bloc in Europe. It was also noted in the talks between the Finnish and Austrian foreign ministers that there are no political problems between the two countries.

ITO, VAN AGT ON JAPAN-EUROPE ECONOMIC FRICTION

[Excerpt] The Hague Dec 12 KYODO--Prime Minister Andreas A.M. van Agt of the Netherlands told Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito Friday that his country would take a firm stand against all forms of protectionism. Commenting on the Japan-Europe economic friction, he said a real solution of the problem can be brought about not by Japan restricting its exports to Europe but by Europe increasing exports to Japan. Ito told the prime minister that he agrees to a solution through realizing a balance in trade on an expanded basis.

ITO, VAN DER KLAAUW HOLD TALKS IN THE HAGUE

[Text] The Hague Dec 13 KYODO--Foreign Ministers Masayoshi Ito of Japan and Christoph van der Klaauw of the Netherlands shared their concern about the fate of condemned South Korean dissident leader Kim Tae-chung during their talks here Saturday afternoon.

The Japanese foreign minister is here in the course of his official tour of France, Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands and West Germany.

During the two and a half hour meeting, Ito briefed his Dutch counterpart on the latest Asian situation, including the Kim Tae-chung case. Ito stressed that peace and stability in the Korean peninsula is vital for Japan.

The problem about Kim is one of the biggest concerns for Japan, Ito told the Dutch minister.

In response, Van der Klaauw said his country is also concerned about Kim's fate. The Netherlands' ambassador to Seoul has already conveyed to the South Korean Government a common apprehension about Kim's fate being shared by the European Community (EC) group, he said.

As for economic friction between the EC and Japan, the Dutch foreign minister asked for Japan's cooperation in correcting the current trade balance now in favor of Japan. But the Dutch minister said he would uphold free trade, though he admitted that there are voices among some EC circles for protectionist steps against Japan. The Netherlands, which becomes the chairman nation of the EC group from January, will try to seek some solution to the Japan-EC economic friction without discarding the free trade principle, he told Ito.

The Japanese foreign minister then pointed to differences in sanctions against the Soviet Union which the United States, Japan and the EC nations have been taking in protest against the continued Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. Such a gap in sanctions against the Soviet Union must not be repeated in the case of Poland, he said. Van der Klaauw said the anti-USSR sanctions on the Afghan issue were not well organized on the whole. But, if Poland becomes an issue, a more unified reaction can be taken because it was already agreed that the foreign ministers of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) member countries would have emergency talks whenever such a discussion is necessary, he told Ito.

GENSCHER ON NATO TALKS ON POLAND, BREZHNEV PLAN

DW121136 Mainz ZDF Television Network in German 2000 GMT 11 Dec 80

[Statement by Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher at a press conference in Brussels on the occasion of a NATO foreign minister meeting--live or recorded]

[Text] The reactions to potential actions taken by the other side will have to be determined by the character of such action. I am not one of those who might say that the present situation is normal. The concentration of strong troop components around the People's Republic of Poland is anything but a normal situation. This is, indeed, exerting influence pressure from outside.

We, the West, have consistently pursued the principle of nonintervention and we will continue to do so--something that we will make quite plain here once again. At this time concerted action by the United States and the Europeans is particularly urgent and particularly necessary.

It is obvious that with regard to its ability to act the alliance is more than just an association for the preservation of military security. It has become more and more a factor of world political stability on the basis of common convictions and concepts of values, while the Soviet Union, with its policy of expansion, contradicts the will of the people for independence and sovereignty. That pertains to the policy in the Third World, but it also is applicable in general. A very clear and intentional policy of the West, accepting all people's right to self-determination, is of decisive significance.

As regards Brezhnev's Gulf plan, one must say that an end of the Afghanistan intervention is a prerequisite for security in the Gulf region. That is the real threat, not just to Afghanistan, but to the states in the region as a whole. Second, it will be necessary for the states of the region to comment on it. No tutelage by powers outside the region should take place with regard to what should happen in the region.

Strong Foreign Policy

[Text] Bonn, 13 Dec (DPA)--According to Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher the Federal Government's foreign policy will be determined during the current difficult situation by firmness, predictability and prudence. One day after the end of the Brussels NATO meeting Genscher said in his Wuppertal constituency today, according to FDP spokesman Josef Gerwald, that this also means German politics will not be provoked, however excited and polemic the voices from the other side.

Genscher, who was sharply attacked by the GDR media on Friday, said that the following the Brussels meeting one could note with satisfaction that this view is shared by all the allies. The deliberations and the outcome of the conference are the expression of inner coherence of the alliance and of its will to safeguard peace. The NATO foreign ministers left open the door of cooperation for all states who, like the Federal Republic, seek to expand security and cooperation through consistent realization of the Helsinki Final Act. This includes respecting the sovereignty of all states as well as the policy of strict noninterference.

Genscher emphasized that the Federal Government is aware it can work for stability in Europe and the German people not by strong words but only through a responsible policy jointly with the allies. Its objective is to help avoid a serious crisis and not to do the opposite. He appealed to all signatory states to the Helsinki Final Act to act with the same sense of political responsibility.

FRG 'SURPRISED' AT GDR REMARKS ON NATO COMMUNIQUE

[Text] Bonn, 12 Dec (DPA)--"A government spokesman said in Bonn on Friday evening that the Federal Government was "surprised" about the statement made by GDR Foreign Minister Fischer, which obviously did not take into account the very careful communique of the NATO Council of Ministers' meeting in Brussels of the same day. The "four points the NATO states mentioned as reaction to an intervention in Poland, which Fischer had quoted as a basis for his threat that the GDR would not longer adhere to the transit agreement and the basic treaty, had not been the object of the deliberations in Brussels." The government spokesman said that this question did not arise for the Federal Government.

The Federal Government had pointed out that the transit agreement and the basic treaty were to be "strictly adhered to" and fully applied. The Federal Government and its allies are observing the development in Poland with great concern.

At the same time it was underlined that Bonn continues to see no reason to comment on the internal situation in Poland. The Federal Government does not interfere and also expected that the other CSCE member states will do likewise, it was stressed.

Boelling Statement

[Text] Bonn, 14 Dec (DPA)--Government Spokesman Klaus Boelling has rejected the latest remarks by GDR Foreign Minister Oskar Fischer, calling the East Berlin accusations totally unjustified.

In an interview on Deutschlandfunk, Boelling said on Sunday that the accusations from East Berlin were of a polemic character. In fact, it was the GDR which, by raising the compulsory minimum exchange amount for visitors from the West, had placed a strain on relations between the two German states, said Boelling, who next February is to succeed Guenter Gaus as head of the FRG's permanent mission in East Berlin.

According to the government spokesman the Federal Government is waiting for the GDR leadership's realization "that this is a grave set back for which it alone is responsible." Boelling underlined Bonn's willingness to negotiate with East Berlin provided the principle of balanced interest forms the basis. It is "our patriotic duty" to improve inter-German relations step by step, "even if these are minute steps."

An editorial version of the interview was prereleased to DPA.

JAPANESE FOREIGN MINISTER IN BONN FOR TALKS

LD141834 Hamburg DPA in German 1802 GMT 14 Dec 80

[Text] Bonn 14 Dec (DPA)--In the course of his European tour Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito arrived in Bonn tonight on a 1-day visit. Tomorrow he will confer with his German counterpart, Hans-Dietrich Genscher, and after a courtesy call on Federal President Karl Carstens, he will meet Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt in the evening.

He will be discussing current international events and economic issues above all the EC countries' deficit in their trade with Japan. Politically, his purpose will be to coordinate more closely the stance taken toward the Soviet Union. Ito also wants to be briefed on the European position on the situation in the Near and Middle East and on the future cooperation of the EC countries with the United States under President-elect Reagan.

COMMUNIQUE ISSUED ON FOREIGN INTERVENTION IN CHAD

LD131224 Paris Domestic Service in Frnech 1200 GMT 13 Dec 80

[Excerpt] The French Government this morning warned against intervention by foreign elements in Chad and announced France's support of any African effort to reestablish peace.

A communique just issued by the Presidency of the Republic published says that France has showed its respect for the Lagos agreement which, I remind you, organized a government of national unity by withdrawing French troops from Chad. But, seriously worried by the intervention of armed foreign elements, France warns against continued intervention which threatens stability in the region. France will, therefore, support any collective effort by the African states to reestablish peace, safeguard unity and maintain independence.

It can be said this is the first time the French Government has taken such a clear stand since the beginning of the conflict between President Goukouni Oueddei and his former prime minister, Hissein Habre.

French Troop Movements Denied

[Text] Twenty-four hours after France's warning to Libya over its armed intervention in Chad, the Soviet news agency TASS has denounced attempts by imperialist circles to create conditions leading to direct intervention. Referring to the press, in this case the daily LIBERATION, TASS went so far as to allude to French troop movements.

In authorized Paris circles it has been affirmed that this bears no relation to reality. It is recalled in passing that the French external action forces always include units ready to intervene with little notice, but up to the present they have not received any orders to put themselves in a state of reinforced alert. They are maintained, in accordance with their mission, within the framework of the operational capabilities expected of them.

The external action forces consist of the 11th Paratrooper Infantry Division, with headquarters in Toulouse, and the 9th Naval Infantry Division, with headquarters in Saint-Malo.

A word about the situation on the spot: Two-thirds of the capital of Chad, N'djamena, is reportedly held by President Oueddei's coalition forces.

DEBRE SCORES FRENCH INACTION OVER POLAND THREAT

[Text] Mr Michel Debre discussed the Polish situation on Tuesday, 9 December during the Radio Luxembourg-LE MONDE program, and he said: "Our government ought to have helped and ought now to help the Poles. Why didn't it ask the French people to do without meat 1 day every 2 weeks in order to send the meat to the Poles? Why not draw up a list of products which could be bought from Poland in order to keep its factories working? As for the announcement to the Soviets that many things would change if they were to intervene, you can imagine how humiliated I felt to think that the Nine asked the West German foreign minister to inform the Soviet ambassador of this. Wasn't it up to us to say this?

Where is France in all this? What kind of political cooperation is this which means that in the face of a serious problem like the Polish problem it isn't Paris which is saying to the Soviet Union make no mistake, the insecurity in Europe come more from [line dropped in publication] peoples to liberation and, moreover, if you follow that path, all chances of dotente will be jeopardized.

"It was in Paris that this should have been said and it should have been said by the French foreign minister, if not by the prime minister."

PCF RALLIES INTELLECTUALS BEHIND MARCHAIS CANDIDACY

LD121049 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 8 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] A large number of intellectuals accepted the PCF Central Committee's invitation on Saturday afternoon to attend the reception held at Colonel Fabien Square [PCF headquarters] to launch an appeal in support of the Communist candidate in the presidential elections (tomorrow L'HUMANITE will publish an initial list of over 1,000 signatures).

Teachers, engineers, artists and writers, painters and architects, doctors and lawyers crowded into the basement, under the concrete vault designed by Oscar Niemeyer, while the PCF headquarters showed off its functional lines to visitors unacquainted with it.

In a short address Guy Hermier, flanked by Francette Lazard and Rene le Guen (all three members of the Politburo), underlined the importance of the appeal. Speaking on behalf of Georges Marchais, who is visiting southern France, he said that it is not a matter of finding some "ornament" for the election campaign. The intellectuals' appeal, he said, is "an aspect of the present struggles" against the Giscardian policy of cultural abasement. Pointing out how much the Communist candidate's 113 suggestions for extricating the country form the crisis are based on the intellectuals' aspirations and demands, "granting them considerable prominence," Guy Hermier stressed that there is an opportunity for creative people, artists, teachers, engineers, and so forth, to "express a political option for real change." The appeal, he said, is addressed to our country's 4 million intellectuals. This, he added, is "the method we have chosen for talking to them."

To this end, Guy Hermier continued, we are addressing the 70,000 Communist intellectuals and all those who identify with our struggle, urging them to contribute to the success of the current political battle. Finally Guy Hermier announced that Georges Marchais will be meeting with the intellectuals on 30 January 1981 at a reception at the Mutualite in Paris.

FOREIGN MINISTRY ISSUES COMMUNIQUE ON POLAND

[Excerpts] As the Atlantic council's talks come to an end in Brussels, the Italian Foreign Ministry has denied the claims of the official Soviet News Agency TASS that Italy had shown that it intends to keep its distance from the United States' stance on the Polish situation. An Italian Foreign Ministry communique, in fact, points out that Minister Emilio Colombo was in agreement with the other foreign ministers in saying that the West's position, when faced with a deterioration in the situation, must be firm and not provocative, so as not to give another pretext for direct or indirect intervention on the part of the Soviet Union. Italy, reiterates the Italian Foreign Ministry, has, as far as events in Poland are concerned, constantly been motivated by the principle of noninterference.

PINTO BALSEMAO ELECTED PRIME MINISTER-DESIGNATE

[Excerpts] Our reporter at the Altis Hotel where the National Council of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] is in session, is on the line.

Francisco Pinto Balsemao has been elected by the PSD's National Council to the post of party chairman. The National Council has also elected him to the post of prime minister-designate of the Seventh Constitutional government.

The vote on the designation to prime minister, which ended about 10 minutes ago, went as follows: 55 votes in favor, 2 against, 3 blank papers and 1 spoiled paper.

The vote electing him party chairmen went as follows: 59 in favor, 1 against and 1 blank paper.

A news conference is now under way, held by Angelo Correia. He has said that the figures of the votes taken reflect the consensus that exists in the National Council. He views this consensus and the election of Pinto Balsemao as signalling a resolve to strengthen the Democratic Alliance and creating real possibilities for future platforms of understanding with democratic forces of the opposition. In this connection he specifically mentioned the Socialist Party, but restricted the scope of the understanding only to the question of the revision of the constitution.

I understand that the top leadership of the Democratic Alliance will be meeting later this evening. For the moment there is nothing else to report.

Francisco Jose Pereira Pinto Balsemao, 42, is married, with three children. He is a journalist, a lawyer and a businessman. He became a member of the government in 1979 as minister assistant to the prime minister.

A member of the National Assembly from 1969 to 1973, he formed with Sa Carneiro what came to be known as the liberal wing which also included Pinto Leite, Mota Amaral, Pinto Machado and Miller Guerra.

In May 1974 Pinto Balsemao, Sa Carneiro and Magalhaes Mota founded the Popular Democratic Party, which later would change its name to the current Social Democratic Party. Pinto Balsemao is a member of the PSD's Political Committee and chairman of its Committee for International Relations.

In 1975 he was elected to the Constituent Assembly where he was deputy speaker for a period.

In his journalistic career he was chief editor of the magazine MAIS ALTO, worked in DIARIO POPULAR and in 1973 founded the weekly EXPRESSO, where he held the post of director until joining the Sa Carneiro government last year.

CDS Supports Pinto Balsemao

LD140156 Lisbon Domestic Service in Portuguese 2300 GMT 13 Dec 80

[Text] At the end of a meeting held today at a Lisbon hotel, the National Council of the PSD [Social Democratic Party] approved a document in which it reiterates its unswerving resolve to carry out the national blueprint and the strategy which derive their main inspiration from the party's leading militant, Francisco Sa Carneiro.

This was announced at a news conference during which Francisco Pinto Balsemao spoke of the relations between his party and the presidency of the republic.

[Begin Pinto Balsemao recording] The Democratic Alliance has its own blueprint, a blueprint which is not identical to that of the president of the republic. We shall maintain the strategy we have been pursuing in government--a strategy of firmness but not one of permanent obstruction; a strategy in which the government conducts the country's domestic and foreign policies as constitutionally behooves it. [end recording]

After the meeting of the PSD National Council, Francisco Pinto Balsemao had a meeting at the CDS [Social Democratic Center] headquarters with leaders of the Democratic Allinace. Balsemao was accompanied by Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida and Eurico de Melo.

A short while ago the CDS released a communique defining its stand on the choice of Francisco Pinto Balsemao as prime minister. In this communique the CDS National Council leaves the door open to Freitas do Amaral's participating in the future government.

[Begin unidentified CDS spokesman recording] The CDS will respect the choice made by the PSD for the post of prime minister. However, it regrets that the decision was not arrived at through a consensus, and indeed that no attempt was made at reaching such a consensus.

Nevertheless, the CDS will participate in the next government and will lend it its support in the belief that such support will ensure the strengthening of the Democratic Alliance and will further the alliance's national blueprint.

Aware of the decisive role of Prof Freitas do Amaral in the consolidation of the alliance's blueprint and as the most qualified executor of the legacy of Francisco Sa Carneiro and Adelino Amaro da Costa, the CDS National Council conveys to Prof Freitas do Amaral its total confidence and solidarity with regard to the decision he may see fit to make concerning his participation in the government. [end recording]

Balsemao Speaks to Reporters

[Interview with Portuguese Prime Minister-Designate Francisco Pinto Balsemao following his 13 December election as Social Democratic Party chairman and prime minister-designate; place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] Dr Pinto Balsemao, you have been designated prime minister by the PSD [Social Democratic Party]. Are you also the choice of the Democratic Alliance?

[Answer] We are at this moment on our way to meet our allies in the Democratic Alliance to apprise them officially of the vote of the PSD National Council. Therefore I cannot and will not comment on that at this stage.

[Question] Can you comment on the overwhelming vote in your favor at the PSD National Council?

[Answer] It was a decision by an internal party organ, so you will appreciate that it does not behoove me to comment on it. At any rate we must now... [several reporters speak at the same time, interrupting each other]

[Question] What about the composition of the new government?

[Answer] There is plenty of time to discuss that, particularly with the CDS [Social Democratic Center] and the PPM [People's Monarchist Party] and this is what we are going to do. Apart from that, the president of the republic will also be formally appraised of the discussions.

[Question] What are your views on relations with the Presidency of the Republic and on possible approaches to the Socialist Party on the revision of the constitution?

[Answer] Those are questions to which I am not interested in replying at this stage. But I can tell you that, as is obvious the Democratic Alliance has its own blueprint, a blueprint that is not identical to that of the president of the republic. We shall maintain the strategy we have been pursuing in government, a strategy of firmness but not one of permanent obstruction. A strategy in which the government conducts the country's domestic and foreign policies as constitutionally behooves it.

With regard to the revision of the constitution, we admit that it may be possible to reach some sort of agreement with the Socialist Party exclusively in that sphere. This is something to be negotiated in due course.

[Question] Will your negotiations with the CDS be conducted in a calm atmosphere, or do you foresee a heated discussion?

[Answer] Our relations with the CDS are characterized by the greatest normality, and I am sure that this will continue to be the case, as was, in fact, confirmed throughout the week during the preliminary stage that preceded the meeting of the PSD National Council.

[Question] Will the next government be a stable one or a government of transition?

[Answer] It will be a government to govern, therefore a strong government. There is no such thing as weak or strong governments, there are governments that govern well and governments that do not. We intend to form a government to govern well. This is the wish of the Portuguese people who have been given a feeling of tranquillity and stability by the Democratic Alliance, and this is why we won the elections. The implementation of the Democratic Alliance's blueprint continues and will continue for the next 4 years.

EANES ASSURES NO DANGER OF MILITARY COUP

[Text] There is no danger of a military coup d'etat in Portugal, President Ramalho Eanes has said in an interview to the French newspaper LE MONDE. In the interview, published by this Paris evening paper today, President Ramalho Eanes took the view that when democracy is functioning in full, as evidenced once again by the latest elections, there is never the danger of a military coup taking place. Ramalho Eanes added that in a democratic European country like Portugal the danger of a dictatorship is ruled out. The president also ruled out the possibility of there being any incompatibility between himself and the government of the Democratic Alliance just because they were elected by different majorities. I believe, Ramalho Eanes added, that one should rather talk about a convergence, because both the government and the president enjoy the same legitimacy, namely, the one that originates from the people's will.

This convergence, Ramalho Eanes went on to say, will from now on be much more easily obtained since the electioneering, which in most cases was at the root of the dramatization of the problems, has now ceased to exist. With regard to last Sunday's elections, Ramalho Eanes described as a new element to be taken into account this year the disappearance of right and leftwing marginal blueprints, which enabled the electorate to make a clearer choice.

PCP LEADER EVALUATES PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

[Text] In Lisbon this morning, the Portuguese Communist Party called a news conference at party headquarters to release the conclusions on the 7 December presidential elections, reached at a plenum of its Central Committee.

[Begin Alvaro Cunhal recording] The elections showed that the Democratic Alliance [AD] lost a great part of the electoral support which it had obtained--even though by anti-democratic means--on 5 October. The AD majority in the Assembly of the Republic has now ceased to have the corresponding electoral support and, therefore, has no authority to make parliament approve reactionary legislation of which an overwhelming majority of the Portuguese people disapproves and condemns. The ballot in the presidential elections also showed that the majority of Portuguese people reject the AD's policies. The result of the presidential elections thus represents a great victory for democracy in Portugal.

The large majority vote for Ramalho Eanes reflects the confidence, determination and will to defend the Portugal born out of April of the democratic majority, and reveals the existence of an extremely vast social and political camp which (?is essentially opposed to an antidemocratic shift in national policy.

In its appraisal of the prospects for future struggle, the Central Committee paid particular attention to the need to reinforce the organized action of the masses and the military movement.

The presidential elections recorded a great victory for democracy. The electoral victory was not of the PCP, but the PCP recorded an extraordinary political victory against the forces of (?repression). The presidential elections confirmed the PCP's role in the life of the nation as a necessary, indispensable and irreplaceable force for the defense and consolidation of the democratic regime and for the solution of national problems. [end recording]

Afterwards, asked by journalists whether in his view there could be any likelihood of changing the Democratic Alliance's parliamentary majority, Alvaro Cunhal did not advocate dissolution of the Assembly of the Republic but proposed another hypotehsis which seems to hint at a split in the Democratic Alliance.

[Begin Cunhal recording] The hypotheses are various. Mind you, there have been splits (?within groupings) on numerous occasions (?since 25 April, 1974), but there are other hypotheses also, but all of them are constitutional. We have constitutional hypotheses, bases on the constitution and in accordance with normal functioning of (?the institutions). [end recording]

BASQUE LEADER COMMENTS ON TALKS WITH SUAREZ

[Text] Vitoria: Shortly after 1300 this afternoon , Basque Prime Minister Carlos Garaikoetxea met journalists to give a wide-ranging analysis of the visit by Prime Minister Suarez to the Basque country. Mr Garaikoetxea, from the political point of view, what does the visit by Prime Minister Suarez mean for the consolidation of the process of autonomy?

[Begin recording] [Garaikoetxea] I think this visit has enabled us to intensify negotiation which, in any other way, might have taken weeks in the normal process of negotiations. Consequently, I think the visit was very useful because, as well as the talks being taken to the highest level, there have been very intensive negotiations both here and in Madrid.

[Question] What can you tell us with regard to concrete achievements on the polemical subjects of economic agreements and the autonomous police?

[Answer] This is the problem. We have not been able to arrive at definitive conclusions and one has to say, with all frankness, that the differences on some subjects are still important. The way has been cleared to quite an extent and some of the important differences have been overcome. We think both problems could be subject to solution in the immediate future if there is a political will to so do. On the subject of the economic agreements there are really complex technical details which could make the solution more difficult and which could require (?more effort). But it should not greatly surprise anyone, in spite of the logical expectations (?that have arisen), I think, that this has not been definitively resolved in 2 days. It is something else to say this could have begun, as it should have begun, many months ago and have been resolved by now.

[Question] Prime Minister Suarez promised that Second Deputy Prime Minister with Responsibility for Economic Affairs Leopoldo Calvo-Sotelo will visit the Basque country to discuss concrete subjects of the economic crisis which the Basque country is going through. What prospects does the Basque Government see with regard to the visit by the deputy prime minister?

[Answer] First, I should like to say that the Basque Government looks at the very serious crisis in Euskadi without forgetting the crisis which the rest of the state is suffering. But, of course, (?at the very core of) our crisis at the moment is the most serious problem of the crisis, namely, unemployment. There is also, and one must not forget this, the crisis in the most depressed areas such as Andalusia or Extremadura, which is based on the enormous infrastructural deficit which has been our legacy in the Basque country--which we shall, from the autonomous government, have the responsibility of governing in the future--we have to (?raise) our spirits. This is what we have done and what we shall do when Calvo-Sotelo of the Spanish Government arrives. We must make it clear that there is an enormous legacy here which we have to face and to solve with the participation of those from the central government who, up to now, have been responsible for the political and economic management of Euskadi. [end recording]

PCE WARNS AGAINST SOVIET INTERVENTION IN POLAND

[Text] The threat of Soviet divisions on Poland's borders has created new splits between the European communist parties.

The Italians are decidedly against [an intervention], as are the Spanish. Spanish Communist Party Official Manuel Azcarate explained this very firmly to Georges Thourlet:

[Begin recording] [Azcarate] In my view this would be, I would say, unimaginable because it is difficult to find one single reason which could justify Soviet intervention at this moment. If, against any logical reason, this intervention did occur, the reaction of Spanish Communists would be more energetic, more radical than in more or less similar circumstances.

[Question] Such as Afghanistan?

[Answer] Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia, and I would not hesitate to tell you that in this eventuality the Spanish Communist Party would break its relations with the CPSU. I cannot imagine we could continue to have relations should such an eventuality occur. [end recording]

The position of the French Communists is more muted; they do not believe in the possibility of a Soviet military intervention. This is "poisoning" they say.

GRAIN SALES TO USSR TO TOTAL 300,000 TONS

NC131201 Paris AFP in English 1150 GMT 13 Dec 80

[Text] Madrid, 13 Dec (AFP)--Spain is to sell the Soviet Union 300,000 tons of barley [as received] through multinational companies with offices in Madrid, the ABC daily reported today quoting Agriculture Ministry sources.

The three firms involved are Continental, Sesostris and Transafrica. The report said that each of them has being given permission to sell 100,000 tons.

The paper said that the ministry has confirmed the sale of 300,000 tons of wheat to the Soviet Union, and the Continental had already been given permission to export 200,000 tons of it. This sale was announced on November 28.

It was not known which company will receive permission to sell the remaining 100,000 tons of wheat.

This means that Spain's grain sales to the Soviet Union total 600,000 tons.

Spain did not join the American grain embargo against the Soviet Union in retaliation for the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, but since the beginning of the year Spain had not sold any grain to the USSR.

MADRID PAPER CITES CARRINGTON ON CURRENT ISSUES

LD131145 Madrid YA in Spanish 4 Dec 80 p 10

[Angel Antonio Hernandez interview in London with British Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington: "There Is No Deadlock in Negotiations on Gibraltar"—date not given]

[Text] [Question] The world is experiencing one of the gravest periods since World War II. How do you view the situation?

[Answer] From both the political and economic viewpoints, with great concern. Under the present circumstances I believe that cooperation and consultation among the Western allied countries are more necessary than ever.

[Question] What is Britain's stance on Afghanistan and on the war between Iran and Iraq, in one of the most explosive areas of the world and one which is vital for Western interests?

[Answer] With respect to the first point, we are seeking to do everything possible to convince the Soviet Union that the continued presence of its military forces on Afghan territory is completely unacceptable. For our part, we will continue with the line of upholding Afghanistan's right to live under a government elected by the people themselves. The only solution to the present state of the conflict is a withdrawal of Russian troops and the return of Afghanistan to its traditional status of neutrality and nonalignment. In addition, we are seeking to do everything possible to encourage the other countries not to forget the problem of Afghanistan. We are giving aid to Pakistan to enable it to cope with the heavy burden which the conflict has placed upon it.

[Question] Do you believe a Western military intervention in the Persian Gulf as a result of the existing tension is possible?

[Answer] All the states in the region, as well as others which are vitally dependent on the oil shipments passing through the Gulf, are especially interested in preserving freedom of navigation in the area. Only if that freedom were endangered would the possibility of a naval intervention increase. There are no signs of this for the present.

[Question] Following your visit to Poland, do you believe that there is a danger of the USSR's invading the country with its tanks, as it did in Czechoslovakia and Hungary?

[Answer] Our viewpoint in this respect is clear. Poland's problems are an internal affair of the Poles, and it is for them alone to resolve them without external interference of any kind. I am confident that other countries are in agreement on this.

[Question] How would the West react in the event of an invasion?

[Answer] I do not believe that it would be helpful to state now what the reaction would be to circumstances which we deeply hope will not arise. But if that happened, the consequences would be extremely grave. It would mean the end of detente, with all that that entails for world stability.

[Question] Another "hotspot" is Iran. What are the present relations between the British Government and Ayatollah Khomeyni?

[Answer] Although our embassy in Tehran was closed down in September, we remain prepared to maintain diplomatic relations with Iran. However, the detention of the U.S. hostages, whom we trust will soon be released, and the arrest of four British subjects in August constitute a grave obstacle to the complete normalization of relations with Iran, which is what we desire.

The problem of the Iranian students arrested here after a demonstration in London last August is another problem which has nothing to do with the previous problem. The British courts have handled almost all the cases connected with these events. Our basic concern now remains the detention of the four British subjects in Iran. So far we have received no guarantee or authorization of access to them to discover their real situation and the charges leveled against them.

[Question] Confining ourselves to Britain, how do you interpret the antinuclear movement in your country? A few weeks ago, there was a huge demonstration in protest against the British nuclear rearmament program. Do you believe that the Labor Party's stance on unilateral nuclear disarmament is realistic?

[Answer] I do not believe that those who oppose our policy of nuclear deterrence and multilateral arms control--particularly those who advocate unilateral nuclear disarmament--have reflected on the problem. Our policy should be based on reason, not on emotion. Nuclear deterrence has maintained peace in Europe for 35 years. It is true that it represents a balance of terror, but anybody who seeks to dismantle the existing balance should be certain that his alternative is more acceptable and poses less danger of leading to a nuclear catastrophe. Our aim is to maintain stability and at the same time to seek how to reduce the appallingly high level of arms in the world through verifiable and balanced measures for arms control and disarmament.

With respect to the relation currently existing between Spain and Britain, which have perhaps been rather tense over the last few months as a result of the deadlock in the Gibraltar problem, Lord Carrington answered briefly but no less clearly the questions put to him.

With respect to Spain's entry into the EEC, the foreign secretary stated that "there is firm British support for Spain's entry into the European Communities, and with regard to entry into NATO, he stated: "The decision rests entirely with the Spanish Government, but any application by Spain to join the Atlantic organization as a full member would have the British Government's warmest support."

[Question] Would that entry facilitate a final solution to the Gibraltar dispute?

[Answer] Anything which contributes to rapprochement between Britain and Spain would help resolve the Gibraltar problem, as well as help the entire panorama of British-Spanish relations as a whole. At all events, the first essential step is to implement the agreement which Mr Oreja and I myself concluded in Lisbon last April. This would open up new prospects for practical cooperation between the two countries.

[Question] How do you interpret the statements by new Spanish Foreign Minister Perez Llorca on the issue?

[Answer] When I met with him in New York on 25 September he reaffirmed to me his intention of rapidly implementing the Lisbon agreement.

[Question] What is the reason for the deadlock in the negotiations?

[Answer] There is no deadlock, since there are no negotiations as yet. As the Lisbon agreement clearly specifies, the two governments agreed to begin talks aimed at surmounting the differences between the two sides and reestablishing direct communications in the region. I am hoping for rapid implementation of the agreement.

[Question] Does Britain intend to relinquish the last colony existing in Europe?

[Answer] The British commitment to the people of Gibraltar is clear and was reaffirmed in the joint statement made in Lisbon. Negotiations should begin in order to make progress with eliminating our differences concerning Gibraltar.

[Question] Are there nuclear weapons at the British base in Gibraltar?

[Answer] In this matter the policy long maintained by the British Government is neither to confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons in a specific place.

[Question] Finally, Mr Minister, is there any news about the possible state visit by King Juan Carlos to Britain and by Queen Elizabeth to Spain?

[Answer] I am aware that there has been speculation in the press about this. The king, of course, would be well received here, but there are no firm plans for a state visit as yet.

NEW THREE-PHASE AIR DEFENSE SYSTEM PROJECT

[LPA Defense correspondent Robert Hutchinson report]

[Text] London, 14 Dec (LPA)--Britain has launched a top secret multi-million pound programme to make its successful Rapier anti-aircraft missile effective against any air attack until the year 2000, authoritative Whitehall sources disclosed today.

The existence of the three-phase project was inadvertently revealed by the US Defence Department in a memorandum--which escaped vetting by security experts--to a professional committee earlier this year.

RAF sources today denied reports that the service had had to pull out of the third phase of the programme because of financial restraint. Officials said no decision had been made on the RAF's participation in the third phase yet.

Whitehall sources said the US Air Force wants to buy a further 12 of the present towed Rapier in addition to the 28 plus-four trainers already planned for the defence of its seven airfields in the UK. This deal--worth between 141 and 170 million pounds and intended as a small "offset" to the 5,000 million pound strategic Trident missile purchase by Britain--was on condition that the UK recruits 300-400 extra men for the RAF regiment to man the weapons.

But it is pointed out that an order for a further 12--the earlier deal was regarded as the absolute minimum to defend airfields--was dependent on the United States Air Force finding a manpower to operate the missiles themselves. Sources said the Norwegian and Egyptian Governments were showing strong interest in buying the tracked vehicle mounted version of the Rapier missile originally ordered by the Shah of Iran, but subsequently cancelled by the revolutionary government in Tehran. The British Army also wants to buy the 46 units originally ordered by the Iranians. Spain, Singapore, South Korea, Ecuador, Turkey, Greece, and Qatar are also interested in buying towed units, said officials. Such deals, if they come off, would be worth hundreds of millions of pounds to British Aerospace, makers of the missile.

Next week the Swiss Government is expected to announce a 250 million pound order for Rapier.

I SIMERINI on Visit

WC130851 Nicosia I SIMERINI in Greek 13 Dec 80 pp 1, 8

[Dispatch by Mikhalis Ignatiou]

[Excerpt] New York, 12 Dec--According to UN information, UN Secretary General Waldheim intends to propose to the two sides [of the Cypriot talks] the reopening of the Nicosia international airport under a joint federal administration.

Specifically, Waldheim will submit his proposal as a reconciliation formula alternative to the Turkish side's demand for the recognition of Tymbou airport and Famagusta port in exchange for the resettlement of Famagusta. According to Waldheim's proposal, Famagusta port would also be able to operate under a joint federal administration.

Moreover, I have been informed that the UN secretary general will propose, within the same framework and as a reply to the Turkish side's demands for the distribution of foreign aid, the introduction of a mixed economic committee and a reconciliation fund as envisaged in the U.S. plan. Relevant reports are being published in today's edition of New York's Ethnikos Kirix.

O FILELEVTHEROS on Visit

WC141015 Nicosia O FILELEVTHEROS in Greek 14 Dec 80 p 12

[Text] By having contacts at UN headquarters in New York, UN Secretary General Waldheim will undertake an initiative of decisive importance to assist in the moves that will promote a solution to the Cypriot issue through the Nicosia Intercommunal talks. The diplomatic circles stating this also point up the seriousness of the talks between Mr Waldheim and Foreign Minister Rolandhis, who is leaving for New York today for this reason.

Waldheim's initiative was necessary when a very delicate point was reached at the end of the third round of the intercommunal talks. It is being said Waldheim attaches special importance to both sides in Nicosia in finding the first substantive signs that will make an agreement possible.

The outcome of the intercommunal talks, so far, shows that the points on which both sides can come to an agreement are insignificant to the Cypriot problem as a whole and that considerable time is being spent in holding consultations on these points. These points are the social security issue of the Turkish Cypriots and the health of the citizens on both sides. The two sides have different views on all points on the agenda.

However, the talks have stumbled over the Varosha issue in their first steps, for priority reasons. In this connection, diplomatic circles say: In the Varosha issue, the Turkish side, in addition to being vague and unclear, proposes a certain form of "miniagreement" while it combines this solution with a "maximum agreement."

Specifically: Toward the Varosha "miniagreement" the Turkish Cypriot side asks to make it depend on and link it with the issues that concern the form of operation of the occupied Famagusta port, the reopening of the Nicosia airport and that of the illegal Tymbou airport. Specifically, these terms constitute a "maximum" agreement which will predetermine a more general solution to the overall Cypriot problem. It is understood that—after being briefed by his special representative in Cyprus Gobbi on the intercommunal talks' details—Waldheim is obsessed with the wish to find a line to reconciliate the views of both sides for a hopeful continuation of the talks.

MITSOTAKIS MAKES STATEMENT AT END OF NATO MEETING

WC121802 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1600 GMT 12 Dec 80

[Text] In a statement after the conclusion of the NATO ministers conference, Foreign Minister Mitsotakis said, among other things, that he pointed out to the conference that the Greek stand was absolutely identical with that of the other NATO member states; namely, that a possible Soviet military intervention in Poland would mark the end of detente between East and West. Mr Mitsotakis stated that, in such an event, the alliance's ministerial council would hold an emergency meeting. He then added that the meeting which ended today considered various measures to be taken in confronting a Soviet intervention in Poland.

The foreign minister also stressed that Greece's relations with the Balkan and socialist countries are based on the fact that they belong to different alliances and on the mutual respect for independence as well as on the noninterference by one country in the internal affairs of the other.

At the same time, Mr Mitsotakis also said that he had asked at the conference that the alliance should grant more aid to our country for various NATO programs within the framework of the defense needs of Greece as a member of the alliance. He also pointed out that the question of NATO aid to Greece had been outlined in detail by National Defense Minister Averof during the meeting of the defense planning committee held in Brussels last Tuesday and Wednesday.

TO VIMA: TURKEY PROFITS FROM GREECE'S NATO RETURN

WC121625 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 12 Dec 80 p 6

[V.P. Mathiopoulos dispatch: "This Year Turkey Appeared Stronger Before NATO"]

[Excerpts] Bonn, 9 Dec—Following Greece's reintegration into NATO, Turkey appeared at the NATO ministerial conference with clear and definite goals. With the argument that it did not veto Greece's return to the military wing, the Turkish foreign minister will put forward the view that the NATO partners must support Ankara during the final settlement over the Aegean.

According to the opinion of experienced quarters here, there will be arduous negotiations within the military committee—negotiations which will not end with the ministerial conference. For Greece a fresh stage of trial is in the making. This is because NATO is already viewing Turkey--following the most serious crisis in the Near and Middle East—as an "unconquerable castle" in the region where it is the last "safe regime" following the shah's fall and the recent vague directives and orientations of many Arab countries, who follow a balanced policy and move comfortably between the East and the West. The Polish issue, as well, particularly contributes to the strengthening of the Turkish position.

Of course, if by February the Greek side moves successfully, particularly with the new Reagan administration in the United States, it would be possible to make Greece's presence more noticeable. Without this presence, Turkey's strategic importance would be almost completely neutralized. But Ankara's "argument" is that it did not veto Greece's reintegration. Therefore, the Western powers are indebted to it and must endorse a "bill of exchange" in some other field—that is the Aegean—which has been offered to Ankara by Athens itself, as the ambassador of a friendly country has said.

Specifically, the way in which Greek diplomatic quarters have handled the question of withdrawal and reintegration has been unfortunate.

Although Greece did not completely withdraw from NATO—in which case there would be a different policy—all the allies knew that its return was a matter of time. For 6 years, Greece was deprived of the right to veto and as a result a new state of affairs was created in the Aegean. It will now be necessary to wage a diplomatic struggle and to hold long negotiations in order to arrive—in the best of cases—at the status which was in force in 1974; this is something which even our best friends view as doubtful. On the other hand, Turkey has undisputably gained from the new state of affairs—it has given up nothing that it has gained—and it now poses as an ally of "good will" that must be rewarded.

KKE CALLS FOR VIGILANCE AGAINST NATO PLANS

[Statement by the press office of the KKE Central Committee released on 12 December 1980]

[Text] As a result of NATO's decisions and the obligations undertaken by the government of the rightwing, the press office of the KKE Central Committee yesterday released the following statement:

"Less than a month after Greece's reintegration within NATO's military wing, life confirms the conclusions of the KKE that reintegration means conformity to the adventurist goals of the imperialists, new heavy burdens and dangerous obligations for our country.

"It was resolved during the NATO foreign ministers' conference to 'strengthen the southeast wing of NATO in order to effectively protect the vital interests of the West which are being threatened in the Persian Gulf.'

"Today's reports by a progovernment newspaper, originating from an 'authoritative source,' even mention that Greek naval forces, operating within the framework of NATO and the EEC, are about to immediately undertake expanded military responsibilities beyond the boundaries of the Atlantic alliance zone and specifically within the Middle East area.

"The prime minister, during today's press conference, failed to reiterate an earlier government statement that Greece will not undertake increased responsibilities as a result of its reintegration.

"The country's involvement in the dangerous plans of the United States, NATO and the EEC in the Middle East is coordinated to the moves to enforce NATO solutions to Greek-Turkish affairs and the Cyprus issue; to pressures for undermining Greek-Soviet relations; to the position of Foreign Minister Mitsotakis and Defense Minister Averof at NATO's recent summit conferences when they unhesitatingly and completely aligned themselves with the decisions of the American and NATO imperialists to enforce a climate for a cold war confrontation in Europe and for new increased war expenditure by NATO countries.

"These developments confirm that the rightwing leads our country along the road to national dangers and adventures.

"It is imperative that the rightwing leave the country's government, that the country be rid of the policy of subjugation and obedience to the imperialists before it is too late.

"More than ever before, what is needed today is militant vigilance and intervention by the peoples' movement—joint action by the democratic anti-imperialist forces—against NATO and the destructive consequences of reintegration, so that foreign bases are eliminated, and so that a policy of national independence and peace can be implemented." [Dated] 12 Dec 80 in Athens. [Signed] the Press Office of the KKE Central Committee.

I AVYI: PLANS UNCOVERED TO KIDNAP MINISTERS

[Excerpts] Representatives of the April 1967 junta have contacted the mafia abroad for the purpose of organizing the kidnapping of Greek ministers abroad. The aim is blackmail: at a later stage, the ministers would be exchanged for the juntist convicts from Koridhalios prisons. This information has been passed on to the Greek KYP [Central Intelligence Service] by foreign police—most probably the Belgian police.

According to the information, a meeting was recently held in Belgium between junta elements and representatives of the Belgian mafia. The junta elements suggested at the meeting that the mafia undertake the kidnapping of Greek ministers abroad on behalf of the junta. The mafia representatives asked 22 billion Belgian francs as a reward, which the juntists agreed to, but with the reservation to confirm it later.

It appears that the information of the foreign police source ends here; that is, it has not been learned whether the deal was finally closed or the negotiations on the question of the reward are continuing. However, the government has taken special security measures for its members travelling abroad, mainly to Brussels, where, because of the EEC and NATO, there is increased movement of Greek ministers and other senior state officials.

KYP has accordingly informed the ministers themselves who would be traveling abroad in the very near future. It is amazing, however, that although almost a week has elapsed since the KYP received the information from the Belgian police, the government has refrained from openly condemning this activity by the junta remnants. Besides, the government continues with the line of tolerance toward them, a tolerance which is related to the attempt to win over the extreme rightwing groups in view of the elections.

More on Plans

AT131355 Athens I VRADHINI in Greek 13 Dec 80 pp 1,14

[Text] While reports were confirmed in Athens that appropriate authorities knew of the intentions of extremist elements to kidnap Greek ministers in Brussels, Foreign Minister Konstandinos Mitsotakis, who is in the Belgian capital, was due to move today from a central hotel to the Greek Embassy for security reasons.

As reported, this move was recommended by the Belgian police who appear to be in possession of information about peculiar contacts between junta representatives in West Europe and elements of the notorious mafia. At the same time, a government source in Athens yesterday confirmed that Greek authorities were aware of certain reports about the planned kidnapping of members of the Greek Government who were in Brussels on mission. The same source added that ministers were asked to take the necessary measures and to avoid night outings and so forth.

According to a report in a leftwing newspaper, junta personalities and representatives of the mafia met in Belgium and the first group asked the second to organize the kidnapping of Greek ministers on behalf of the junta. Members of the mafia asked for the sum of 22 million Belgian francs (approximately 30 million drachma). The junta followers had reservations about this sum but, at the same time, they did not reject the offer.

It must be emphasized that with our country's imminent accesion to the community the need to have a member of the Greek government present at EEC headquarters increased recently. Four ministers—K. Mitsotakis, E. Averof, G. Kondoyioryis, Ath. Kanellopoulos and the chief of the National Defense General Staff, General Gratsios—were all in Brussels at the same time barely three days ago.

Always according to the same reports, the first target of the junta-mafia group would be Foreign Minister Mitsotakis. His duties force him to remain in Brussels at least until next Wednesday. According to the reports, the Belgian police already informed KYP, the Central Intelligence Service, and in turn KYP warned the ministers who are in Belgium and other West European capitals.

AKROPOLIS ON PLOTS, EXPULSION OF SOVIET ATTACHE

AT141550 Athens AKROPOLIS in Greek 14 Dec 80 pp 1, 14

['Exclusive' AKROPOLIS reportage: 'Plot To Murder Averof, Andreas [Papandreou]--Soviet Cultural Attache Expelled as Liaison Between the KGB and Athens Leftists']

[Excerpt] Plots to murder politicians and other personalities including Papandreou, Averof, Stamatis, Balkos, were prepared by leftist extremist organizations with which the Soviet cultural attache in Athens, who has already been expelled, maintained contacts on behalf of the KGB. Operations of these organizations were directed from East European countries. This important information, together with other intelligence, equally startling, is included in a confidential report which came to the attention of appropriate authorities. "AKROPOLIS" reveals the contents of this report today.

The planned murder plots included members of the judiciary, officers, policemen, newsmen, industrialists and others. According to the information in the secret report, these murders and other acts of terrorism were aimed at creating a state of chaos and instability in the country in an effort to help promote the goals of those who direct the entire "operation" of terror from the outside.

More specifically, the operations of leftists extremist organizations in Greece were the special target of Soviet authorities. The cultural attache of the Soviet Embassy in Athens did whatever he could in order to exercise an effective control over their activities. Placing the entire student movement in our country under Soviet control was the ultimate goal.

In an effort to accomplish his mission the above-mentioned Soviet cultural attache maintained contacts, with as much discretion as possible, with leftist university students and other students both in Athens and in other Greek towns.

Another goal of this attache was to place the entire sector of secondary education and the sector of free studies, the independent study institutions, under his control and guidance. For this reason he established "circuits" and indirect connections. His activities, however, came to the notice of security authorities with the result that he was classified an undesirable and his expulsion was requested through a Greek demarche. It is a fact that he was obliged to leave our country without undue noise while, at the same time, the Greek side avoided any announcement of this fact.

His expulsion was dictated by particularly heavy evidence that he was acting on behalf of the KGB under the cover of the cultural attache--a practice often used by Soviet secret services for its personnel who operate in foreign countries. An extremely qualified lady is today carrying out the duties of the cultural attache.

It is particularly significant that at the time the expelled official was conducting his illegal activities we have had student mobilizations, the occupation of university schools by leftists, strikes, marches and other mass activities within the student sector.

According to the same reports, it is planned to make the activities of Greek and foreign terrorists in Greece more severe. This is because those who direct them and who belong to the secret services of East European countries as well as to certain Middle East countries appreciate the fact that the Greek area is of a vital interest to them for the following reasons:

to create a state of chaos and instability in the country.
to stop democratic progress.
to raise obstacles to Greek cooperation with the EEC.
to create obstacles to cooperation between our country and NATO after its reintegration within the military wing of the alliance.

These views on increased terrorist activities are based upon the conclusion that at least certain of the opposition parties encourage the extremists in their actions through the tactics they pursue. At the same time,those who direct the extremists also know that they can send their "agents" into Greece very easily since entry into the country--and departure from it--are very easy both for tourist reasons and because Greece borders with countries from which entry is very easy. An additional reason is that there is no effective control at the Greek frontiers-over persons who are entering or leaving.

According to the same information included in the report, plans have been completed for the murders of Papandreou, Stamatis, and Balkos, with no indication that the list ends here. There are indications that more personalities are included on the murder list.

Plans have also been made for the murder of deputies in the Chamber of Deputies, of judiciary personalities (for example, Beltsas), police officers such as Yiannoulis, Karathanasis, Lambrou and others, newsmen, military officers, industrialists and others. The murder of political personalities falls within the portion of the operation aimed at creating a state of chaos in Greece.

On the basis of these reports, warnings were issued to personalities mentioned in the list so that they can take steps to protect themselves over and above the security measures adopted by the appropriate authorities.

The following fact which came to the possession of authorities also indicates the interconnection of the terrorists with foreign centers: the recent presence in Greece of two secret agents from an East European country who stayed for a week and then departed. At the same time there are incessant reports reaching the appropriate authorities of Western countries of terrorist training camps operating in East European countries. Such camps are operating in the (Erkness) area of East Berlin where West German terrorists and terrorists from other European countries receive their training.

Extremist Palestinians are being trained outside Varna in Bularia while European, African, South American and Japanese terrorists are being trained on the island of (Soukafa) of communist South Yemen. It is reported that similar camps are operating in Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Romania, the Soviet Union and in Albania.

In parallel to all these, similar camps for training terrorists are in operation in Algeria, in the area of (Bleida) which is 50 kilometers from the Algerian capital, in Libya in the ("Tokra") camp which is 30 kilometers from Bengazi, at the ("Ras el Hilal") camp which is situated in a forested mountain area 100 kilometers from Bengazi, at the ("El Khoms") camp 120 kilometers from Tripoli and at the ("Khimpva"), ("Beneina") and "Sert") camps. Other such training camps under the control of the Palestinians are operating in Syria, Iraq and the Lebanon where the ("Setilla") camp is to be found. It is this camp that five members of the terrorist organization "Peoples Front Initiative" were trained. This organization was dislocated by police authorities last February. To a considerable degree the terrorists use weapons and explosives manufactured and originating in East European countries.

Greek terrorists have interconnections with the Red Brigades of Italy. The magazine published by ELA, United Peoples Struggle, often publishes details of the activities of the Red Brigades.

In Greece we have the "Organization of the New Revolutionary Left" which is torn apart by internal disruptive trends. Of these, the one which is described as the old guard advocates development of an armed revolutionary climate in Greece while the trend described as the new generation reacts to similar goals.

At the same time there existed the organization ELA, Greek Peoples Struggle, which broke up and gave birth to the ELA-OPA (Organization of the Proletarian Left) and the "Independent Left" which has 50 to 100 members.

There are also the OSE (Organization of Socialists of Greece), the communist organization "The Fighter," the Rigas Feraios Organization--the second Penhellenic Youth Organization (which was broken up by the KKE-Interior), there is the OKDE, the Organization of Communist Internationalists of Greece and the Organization of Anarchist Communists.

The organization of "17 November" originated from OPA while the organization "Armed Revolutionary Party of the New Revolutionary Left" supports armed violence at every opportunity in its aim to establish a new order of things.

KKE ORGAN ASKS FOR OFFICIAL STAND ON POLISH ISSUE

NC121718 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 12 Dec 80 pp 1, 9

[Editorial: "They Are Playing with Fire."]

[Excerpts] The escalation of the campaign by international reaction to undermine socialist Poland has reached the limits of exasperation and cold war hysteria. Using as a pretext the scenario of "future developments," which have been sketched by the CIA and other imperialist agencies, the hawks of Washington and NATO are systematically heading toward an extremely dangerous aggravation of the whole situation in Europe. Their coordinated and open intervention in the internal affairs of Poland has become the barb of a more general attack against European security and peace.

The atmosphere of the cold war prevails in all the activities--political and military--of the imperialist leaders. Their rapacious hands, hooked on socialist Poland, are openly threatening the independence of this country as well as security and peace in Europe. They are literally playing with fire. There is not and there could not be a road of Poland's return to the capitalist jungle. The barrier of history is solid and impregnable. Where, then, do the Western leaders want to push things? Where are they trying to lead the world by directly undermining the world's peaceful gains? Their adventures are not going to remain unanswered. Gone are the times when the future of Europe and the fate of mankind were a small pawn on the chessboard of imperialist interests.

Under these circumstances, the ruling rightwing [in Greece] is shouldering particular responsibilities by absolutely aligning its stand with the cold war direction of its Atlantic allies; it willingly becomes an accomplice in the dangerous charging of the European and international atmosphere. The radio, television and the progovernment press, named and unnamed elements, are competing in manifestations of antisocialist exasperations; they support and strengthen the confrontation measures of the United States and NATO. The commitments that have been undertaken with Greece's reconfinement into the North Atlantic bloc are on the road to immediate realization. Greece is being led into the vise of new adventures with unpredictable consequences for its interests. In view of the reasonable unrest of public opinion, the government of "New Democracy" must publicly and lucidly take a clear stand:

What obligations has it undertaken or is it prepared to shoulder in Europe?
What specific commitments has it accepted, particularly at the NATO meetings?

The slandering clamor, which its propaganda machinery has unleashed around the "Polish affair," cannot bring about a distraction from the real problem. The government's guilty silence "speaks" very eloquently...?

LAW PUBLISHED ON DUTIES, POWERS OF NSC MEMBERS

TA121818 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1800 GMT 12 Dec 80

[Text] A law which stipulates that the duties, powers and responsibilities of the president and members of the National Security Council will be in effect until the Turkish Grand National Assembly begins to function again was published in a second edition of the Official Gazette today.

The first article of the law says that the National Security Council president is Head of State and Chief of the General Staff Gen Kenan Evren and that its members are Ground Forces Commander Gen Nurettin Ersin, Air Force Commander Gen Tahsin Sahinkaya, Navy Commander Adm Nejat Tuner and Gendarme Commander Ben Sedat Celasun.

The second article says: The duties, powers and responsibilities of the president and members of the National Security Council will be in effect, regardless of their rank and service terms and ages, until the Turkish Grand National Assembly--which will be established in accordance with a new constitution that will be prepared by the constituent assembly and submitted to a public referendum--begins to function again.

More on NSC Law

Excerpt] The third article of the law stipulates the ways in which the posts of president or member of the National Security Council can be filled in case they are vacated.

It says: In case it is vacated, the presidency of the National Security Council will be filled with the appointment by the National Security Council of the most senior force commander and National Security Council member to the post of Chief of General Staff. The membership of the council, when vacated, will be filled in the same way—with the appointment of a commander to the force command or the gendarme command and with his joining the National Security Council. The law will be in effect retroactively since 12 September 1980.

Another law which was published in the second edition of the Official Gazette today stipulates that appointments can be made to the post of deputy force commander from among the generals and admirals. Under the law, so long as the National Security Council remains in power, appointments can be made from among the generals and admirals to the post of deputy force commander following a proposal by the concerned force commander and after a decree to that effect is signed by the National Security Council members and approved by the head of state. Generals and admirals appointed this way will remain in that duty for 2 years. This period can be extended by 1 year by means of a decree signed and approved in the same way. The law stipulates, however, that the generals and admirals appointed in this manner must not exceed their age limit for their rank during that period. The National Security Council will be able to remove the deputy force commanders from their powers in the same way that it appoints them.

OIL DEPOSITS DISCOVERED IN SOUTHEASTERN PROVINCE

[Text] Ankara, 14 Dec (AA)--New oil deposits were discovered in the Bismil County of the southeastern province of Diyarbakir during drilling operations staged jointly by Alaaddin Middle East Company and the Trans-Mediterranean Oil Company of Canada. The deposit, expected to yield 30 million barrels, was discovered at 2,100 metres. Under the first layer, there exists another one amounting to some 150 million barrels at 3100 meters and drillers were trying to reach it, company officials said today.

Existence of oil deposits were indicated by seismic signals and in case they are confirmed by drilling, a new geological assessment of the Anatolian region should be made, they added, pointing out that this would help resolution of Turkey's energy problem. First results should be obtained by March 1981. The quality of the Bismil oil equals that the Kuwaiti oil, it was stressed.

'PALME COMMISSION' MEETS IN VIENNA 13-14 DEC

AU151427 [Editorial Report] Several Vienna papers in the period from 13-15 December draw attention to the 13-14 December session of the so-called Palme Commission--the Independent Commission for Disarmament and Security Issues (ICDSI)--in Vienna.

Vienna DIE PRESSE in German on 13-14 December notes in its report that the commission, which was founded in Vienna on 13 September, wants to work out disarmament proposals of its own in time for the second UN General Assembly special session on disarmament issues scheduled for 1982. The paper lists the following participants in the Vienna meeting chaired by Sweden's Olof Palme: Cyrus Vance (United States), Georgiy Arbatov (USSR), Egon Bahr (FRG), Josef Cyrankieviwz (Poland), Jean-Marie Daillet (France), Robert A. D. Ford (Canada), Alfonso Garcia Robles (Mexico), Loesun Obasanjo (Nigeria), Salim Ahmed Salim (Tanzania), Joop de Uyl (the Netherlands), David Owen (Great Britain), Gro Harlem Bruntland (Norway), Haruki Mori (Japan) and C.B. Muthamma (India).

Vienna KURIER in German on 13 December lists as another participant Shridat Ramphal from Guyana, but states that former Polish Premier Josef Cyrankiewicz, whose participation had been announced, has "stayed home." The paper notes in this context that Cyrankiewicz in the past few days has been accused of having given the fateful shooting order against Polish workers in Gdansk 10 years ago.

While the Vienna press on 15 December carries only very brief reports on the conclusion of the ICDSI meeting without any details, DIE PRESSE on 15 December features reports on interviews with various participants, including Georgiy Arbatov, who ruled out any possibility of Soviet intervention in Poland; Cyrus Vance, who warned against new SALT II negotiations on the grounds that "the result could only be a worse treaty." Great Britain's David Owen, who declared that "the West has no possibility of preventing a Soviet intervention in Poland"--it could only make a maximum effort to impress upon Moscow that it would have to pay a high economic and political price for it; and the FRG's Egon Bahr, who stressed the need for the members of both NATO and the Warsaw Pact to remain loyal to their alliances, as this is a prerequisite for any successful policy of detente. None of the reports contain any reference to what was discussed at the Vienna ICDSI meeting.

FINLAND'S VAYRYNEN MEETS PAHR, KREISKY IN VIENNA

[Summary] Finnish Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen, who is paying an official visit to Austria, on 12 December had working talks with Foreign Minister Willibald Pahr about Finnish truck shipments through Austria, and intensified cooperation in third countries. The ministers agreed to have an experts' committee study the disproportion between Finnish shipment quotas and the share of Austrian firms in the shipment of Finnish goods. Regarding cooperation in third countries, the Paskov, CSSR, Cellulose Combine Project and the construction of a cellulose factory in East Kalimantan in Indonesia were discussed.

Foreign Minister Vayrynen then visited the Austrian parliament where he was received by the Nationalrat chairmen and deputies of the Freedom Party. At noon, the Finnish foreign minister gave a luncheon for Foreign Minister Pahr at the Imperial Hotel. In their toasts both ministers stressed the close ties between the two countries and their mutual efforts to promote detente. Afterwards, the Finnish guest was received by Chancellor Kreisky and President Kirchschlaeger.

Foreign Minister Vayrynen will leave Vienna today, 13 December, in the afternoon.

GENSCHER DENIES NATO REACTION PLAN ON POLAND

[Text] The Hague, 15 Dec (DPA)--Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher deems it particularly necessary for the West to remain calm and circumspect with regard to Poland and not let itself be provoked. Geuscher told the press in The Hague today at the conclusion of a short working visit with Chris van der Klaauw, his Dutch opposite number: "I do not believe in mutual polemics. In a difficult international situation, circumspection is extremely important." The signals from Luxembourg and Brussels "should be taken seriously in all capitals concerned."

Genscher expressly denied the report by a foreign news agency that the NATO foreign ministers had decided in Brussels last week on a "four-point plan" or countermeasures in the event the USSR intervenes in Poland. "When I came back to Bonn and heard this on the television news, I had to pinch myself to make sure I had heard right."

It was learned on the sidelines of last week's NATO conference in Brussels that the United States had apparently submitted a four-point proposal to its NATO allies, setting out what reaction to a possible Soviet invasion of Poland should be. Accordingly, in the event of intervention, all talks with the Soviet Union on disarmament, economic and financial issues would be broken off. The European Community should break off all "special relations" with the GDR and stop all high-level political contacts with the USSR and any cultural exchange with the Soviet Union.

The discussion between Genscher and Van der Klaauw dealt largely with the program of EEC tasks during the next 6 months. The Netherlands is currently president. Both ministers described the restructuring of the EEC budget as one of the most important tasks. Van der Klaauw announced that he wants to go to Washington after Ronald Reagan's inauguration to discuss the planned new EEC Middle East initiative with the new administration.

On the subject of NATO's counterarming, Genscher stressed that the Federal Government does not "want any singularization of the Federal Republic" in the siting of new medium-range missiles. The more states are involved the better. The Netherlands has not yet decided whether it will allow the new weapons to be deployed on its territory.

12 December Interview

DW151215 Cologne Westdeutscher Rundfunk Network in German 1730 GMT 12 Dec 80

[Walter Hahn interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher in Brussels-live or recorded]

[Text] [Question] In connection with this NATO conference, there was a lot of talk about the members of the Western alliance working out a catalogue of measures in the event the Soviet Union marches into Poland. Is there any truth to this, and to what extent has such a catalogue been prepared here?

[Answer] It is our primary goal to make every effort to prevent an intervention in the People's Republic of Poland. We are not interfering in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Poland; we expect other signatories of the Helsinki Final Act to do likewise.

Everybody must know, of course, that if they violate the Helsinki Final Act this would have far-reaching consequences. This is also expressed in the communique on this meeting.

The kind of consequences will yet have to be discussed in the alliance. The permanent representatives will do that. It will take a political decision to decide which of the reactions deemed possible will then be applied; what I mean to say is that all rumors as to what allegedly one will, wants to or would do are devoid of any basis because this date of decisionmaking has not yet come and, I hope, never will.

[Question] Is that also true of reports that have been circulating to the effect that the U.S. secretary of state has presented a four-point program indicating, for example, consequences for arms control policy, but also consequences for special relations in inner-German trade?

[Answer] The American secretary of state has not presented such a four-point program.

[Question] There was quite a lot of criticism after the Afghanistan intervention that the West was simply not prepared. If no such catalogue of measures has been prepared, what will be done so as not to get into a similar situation if the worst should happen in Poland?

[Answer] I said that the permanent representatives will deal with possible reactions without deciding on which reaction to take. That will be dependent on developments, and it will be a political decision.

[Question] Another point that played a great role is the financing of Western security, the attempt to make more expenditures, a minimum 3-percent increase annually. What conclusions were reached at the end of this NATO conference with regard to this most controversial and difficult problem for all member states?

[Answer] It is indeed a difficult problem for all. We Germans are using the funds allotted to defense in a most effective form, in the very most effective form. This also explains why our contribution to joint security is assessed very highly in the West and in the East.

The issue you have mentioned was the subject of discussions by the defense ministers. My colleague Apel, as well as his other colleagues, has obviously closed the issue in a satisfactory way. It did not concern the foreign ministers.

FOREIGN MINISTER GENSCHER TO VISIT CSSR 18 DEC

BOELLING INTERVIEWED ON POLAND, GDR CHARGES

[Correspondent Voigdt interview with Klaus Boelling, state secretary and spokesman of the Federal Government, in Bonn--live or recorded]

[Excerpt] [Question] Mr Boelling, as far as the situation in Poland is concerned, the Federal Government, as well as other Western governments, are quite clearly endeavoring not to add to the tension, at least not on their own part.

At the same time the Western governments make no bones about the fact that a Soviet military intervention in Poland would entail very serious consequences for the future of international relations in Europe or throughout the world and would spell the end of the policy of detente. What is your impression? Has this warning signal gotten through to Moscow, that is, has it been properly understood?

[Answer] I think, Mr Voigdt, that we must not underrate the sensitivity of the responsible people in Moscow and in the other Warsaw Pact capitals. The West has pointed out repeatedly that any violation of the Helsinki Final Act would seriously impair the climate of cooperation in Europe and in the world, especially violations of the extremely important principle of nonintervention. You will recall that Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and French President Giscard d'Estaing said in a German-French communique at the beginning of this year regarding Afghanistan that another blow to the policy of cooperation would not just further jeopardize, but would fundamentally imperil detente and might even destroy it. I am quite sure that even this was properly understood by those for whom it was meant.

[Question] The economic situation, and above all the food situation, in Poland is obviously extremely serious. The federal cabinet dealt in detail with the planned European Community food aid to Poland Wednesday. Will it be possible to grant this assistance quickly enough, in sufficient quantity and under generous financial terms?

[Answer] I do not think that it is a matter of generosity. It will have to be made clear first of all, and the chancellor and Federal Foreign Minister Genscher have made this clear beyond any doubt, that we have no intention of interfering in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Poland. This remains unchanged even if some people day after day, try to suggest that we harbor such motives. Those who do this have motives of their own. However matters develop over the next few weeks, we in any event will not deviate from this principle.

It is a different matter that the European Community is prepared to help if the Polish Government asks the EC for such help for reasons of acute emergencies--which it has done. This has been discussed in the European Commission just as it was discussed in the pertinent Councils of Ministers. It is a foregone conclusion that the members of the European Community will not be tightfisted. Poland is not a developing country, of course, but whatever we can do to help the Polish leadership in overcoming economic emergencies in the interest of the internal stabilization of its country will surely be done. And I am just as sure that in this respect the governments of the European Community will not be tightfisted.

[Question] This weekend the GDR accused the Federal Government of having a provocative policy because of its association with the warning signal from Brussels, and the GDR on its part threatened negative consequences, for example, for transit traffic. Does it look like there are basic dangers facing the network of inter-German treaties and agreements?

[Answer] I refuse to take threats as uttered by the GDR's responsible leadership seriously as meaning that the GDR has even the least, the slightest cause to threaten us with such consequences. Actually it was the GDR which some time ago burdened the relations between the two German states by raising the minimum exchange amounts, and we are waiting for the GDR leadership to realize that this was a serious setback for which it alone bears the responsibility. These threats are entirely without basis, because the Western alliance does not intend to bring pressure to bear on anyone. NATO is concerned, just like the whole world is concerned, but it does not threaten anyone nor does it raise any demands on anyone. And perhaps the GDR has not thought about these threats long and thoroughly enough. In any event, we cannot but reject most decisively this formulation used by the GDR foreign minister. The charges are absolutely unjustified; they are of a polemic character.

[Question] The delimitation policy of the GDR must not be responded to with acts of delimitation on the part of the Federal Government. The chancellor confirmed this line for German policy in his government statement. Can one conclude that there will be further negotiations on concrete agreements in the near future, or is the intention not to spoil anything for future, better times?

[Answer] It would be too modest to be content with the statement, Mr Voigdt, that we are basically prepared to cooperate. The chancellor said in the government statement that we know the basic differences with regard to political aims of the two states and that we do not want to cover them up. But the GDR will find us prepared at any time to negotiate if the basis is the principle of a balance of interests, the principle of recognizing the interests of the two states. We will not be restrained if the opportunity comes up to negotiate with the other side on practical problems.

Many people ignore and forget in these difficult times that we have achieved quite a lot in past years to the benefit of the citizens of the GDR and the citizens of our state. I do not like to speculate over and over again about bad weather periods--we have such a period at present--and say that nothing works any more. Improving inter-German relations step by step, even small step by small step, is our patriotic duty. It is like drilling a very thick plank. Everybody in Germany, being forced to accept the division of this country, knows that we are far from ideal solutions and also knows that we do not feel relieved of the duty of continuing to make new attempts.

[Question] Berlin CDU Deputy Lorenz asked the Federal Government recently to clarify what prerequisites it considers indispensable for future talks on new agreements with the GDR. Must East Berlin's readiness to revoke at least in part the recent drastic increase in the exchange amounts for travel to the GDR be considered in this sense as indispensable?

[Answer] You remember, Mr Voigdt, that we have said repeatedly that we cannot accept the unilateral increase in the minimum exchange amount, something which has particularly hit old people very hard. Our critics have asked what that means? The answer of the Federal Government was and is that we want to talk to the GDR on the general context of relations. This includes, naturally, also talks on how the barrier that has been needlessly increased by the GDR can be lowered again. It naturally also includes talks with the GDR in due time on further practical regulations. The things separating us on principle, ideologically so to speak, must not be an insurmountable obstacle.

[Question] Mr Boelling, you will soon head the Federal Republic's permanent representation in East Berlin. The task will clearly be more difficult than it looked 6 months ago. Let us describe the political situation meteorologically: Are you prepared to face a strong winter, which will possibly last for a very, very long time?

[Answer] Mr Voigdt, I tried a few minutes ago to answer that. I do not like the picture you have just outlined, of frost periods and spells of cold. We have always known, and you know it yourself, that the development of inter-German relations will not effortless; there will be always setbacks. There will be serious setbacks, such as we have experienced recently, and then there were phases where the GDR leadership analyzed its interests correctly and drew the consequences, trying to further strengthen its sovereignty.

We clearly said in the government statement that we do not want to tutor the GDR and that we know that inter-German relations are not independent of relations between the big powers.

We are now experiencing a phase where both big powers observe with interest the intentions to be developed by the leadership in the East and by the future leadership of the United States. Relations between the two German states will very much be influenced by that. Our policy in Bonn will continue to be aimed at doing everything possible to help preserve the cohesion of the nation.

In doing this, we have naturally always taken into consideration the interests of the German Democratic Republic. We will continue to do that in the future.

JAPANESE FOREIGN MINISTER MEETS GENSCHER, CARSTENS

Talks With Genscher

LD151626 Hamburg DPA in German 1419 GMT 15 Dec 80

[Text] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA)--Japan shares the view held by NATO countries that Soviet intervention in Poland would mean the end of detente. This was confirmed today in Bonn by Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito. Following a 2-hour talk with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, Ito, who ends a tour of the most important EC capitals by visiting the Federal capital, also underlined Tokyo's desire for close consultations with the other Western countries on joint action in the event of interference by Moscow.

Ito, who today was also scheduled to visit Federal President Karl Carstens and hold an exchange of views with Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, described the outcome of his talks in Paris, London, The Hague, Brussels and Bonn as important for deepening understanding between Japan and Western Europe. The Japanese foreign minister said that good relations between Japan, Western Europe and the United States are an essential precondition for safeguarding political stability, world peace and the prosperous development of the world economy.

Ito spoke guardedly about the wishes of the Europeans with whom he had talks for limiting the Japanese export drive. The minister pointed out that Genscher shares his view on the avoidance of trade restrictions. Trade is not the business of governments, but a matter for private industry, said Ito, who, moreover, promised a careful examination of what is and is not possible for his government.

Ito drew attention to the fact that the structure of Japanese trade policy has a long tradition and cannot "be changed overnight." He encouraged the Europeans to follow the example of the initiative of Japanese exporters--for instance, their efforts to learn the language of their important trade partners. (in the first six months of this year Japan increased its exports to the EEC by 24.2 percent to $7.5 billion, whereas EEC exports to Japan rose only by 2.8 percent to $3.8 billion).

With reference to thoughts of greater Japanese defense efforts as the country's contribution to more security in the Pacific region, Ito pointed to Japan's alliance with the United States. This agreement is based only on Japan strengthening its self-defense. He had made clear when talking with his German opposite number that his country wants to contribute to safeguarding world peace above all with peaceful and humanitarian acts--for example, in aiding refugees.

Ito said that the state of relations between Japan and China is very good and cooperation is excellent, above all in the economic field. Tokyo has, through a series of credits, complied with Beijing's efforts to modernize its industry. In trade with China, Japan occupies the strongest position of all the Western countries.

Meeting With Carstens

[Excerpt] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA)--In a talk lasting three-quarters of an hour Federal President Karl Carstens was today briefed by Foreign Minister Ito on development in China, about which the Japanese Government is particularly well informed. The federal president's office stated that relations with Europe, Japan and the United States were also discussed. Carstens and his Japanese guest attached particular importance to these relations in view of the serious conflicts in the world.

SCHMIDT APPOINTS NEW GOVERNMENT SPOKESMEN

[Excerpt] Bonn, 15 Dec (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt installed in office today two new government spokesmen, State Secretary Kurt Becker and Lothar Ruehl. He bid farewell in Bonn to the previous government spokesmen, Klaus Boelling and Armin Gruenewald, and paid tribute to their many years of work.

MINISTER FRANKE SAYS NEW COLD WAR 'UNLIKELY'

[Excerpts] Berlin, 12 Dec (DPA)--In view of the common interest of East and West in cooperation and detente, a new "cold war" seems unlikely if things proceed "normally," Egon Franke (SPD), federal minister for inner-German relations, said addressing a working session of the Indivisible Germany Board on the subject of "Germany: Policy and Ostpolitik of the Eighties." The minister nevertheless agreed in Berlin today with the foreign policy spokesman of the CDU-CSU Bundestag group Alois Mertes, that Soviet intervention in Poland would remove the basis for further cooperation between East and West.

Franke said the Federal Government has developed no strategy for the Ostpolitik of the 1980's. The objective of avoiding estrangement of the two German states must be pursued flexibly and pragmatically. Mertes emphasized that Ostpolitik assumes a clear picture of long-term objectives of the Soviet Union. This is determined by an insatiable striving for security, which has no regard for human rights and freedom, and is therefore irreconcilable with Western objectives. From this recognition a strategy should be developed which is characterized by the fight for human rights, renunciation of force and disarmament.

GISCARD VISITS OECD HEADQUARTERS, DELIVERS SPEECH

[Text] Paris, 15 Dec (AFP)--French President Valery Giscard d'Estaing today called on industrialized countries to work together to beat "the most serious, most terrible and most wearing crisis the world has witnessed since the 1930's." During a visit to the headquarters of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) on the occasion of its 20th anniversary, he said: "A return to isolationism would be a mistake."

For most of the OECD's 24 member countries, the crisis took the form of high inflation, widespread unemployment and reliance on imported energies, he said. Mr Giscard d'Estaing called for the development of nuclear and other new energies, along with the conservation of older energies. The "courageous efforts" undertaken by France in this sector would bring benefits from next year onwards.

The French leader said the OECD was destined to play a major role in the North-South dialogue. The industrialized countries currently provided three-quarters of the aid going to the Third World, he declared. He called for a bigger contribution from communist countries and from nations "whose natural resources have recently been uprated."

The French president said France was adopting "a positive approach" to the North-South global negotiations due to begin in 1981. He recalled that France would next year host a UN conference dealing with developing countries' problems. On France's own difficulties, he said that bringing down the rate of price increases was central to French Government Policy. Budget policy had been "prudent" and monetary policy "conformed to the necessities of the moment", but price rises had still been substantial.

NATO PONDERS RETALIATORY MEASURES ON POLAND

[Philippe Lemaitre dispatch: "Not Repeating the Mistakes of the Afghan Crisis"]

[Text] Brussels--How appropriate is it to deliberate in Brussels on the retaliatory measures which could be taken by the Atlantic alliance countries if the Soviet Army intervened in Poland? The 15 foreign ministers will have to carefully balance the concern to "deter," and convince the Russians by their attitude that an intervention would have major drawbacks, with the risk of making the operation easier by dint of talking as if it were inevitable. Will the effort to steer a middle course between these two needs, which are partially conflicting, divide the 15? Will it produce a hard-line camp. The U.S. camp, primarily concerned to clearly show its intention not to sit back and do nothing, and the cautious camp which would comprise most of the Europeans who think the main thing is not to give any pretext to those who, on the Soviet side, advocate strong action? There is reason to think that efforts will be made to avoid this split.

For instance, on Wednesday [French Foreign Minister] Francois-Poncet stressed the need not to present the debate as a source of new difficulties among the allies. Indeed, at least at the present stage, the Europeans and Americans have a fairly similar analysis of the situation and its possible consequences. The differences are differences of emphasis. Although Washington has, for a week, been tending to dramatize the situation more than the West European chancellries, and to readily emphasize the most alarming reports (probably to counter the effect, considered demobilizing, of the statement published by the Warsaw Pact summit), it is true that nobody is calling into question reliable and accurate signs showing that the Soviet forces are placing themselves in a position to intervene in Poland.

The allies all agree that all the military preparations cannot be accepted with indifference. This idea will emerge in the communique published Friday at the end of the Atlantic council meeting.

The NATO countries also seem convinced of the need not to make the same mistakes they made during the Afghan crisis when each country reacted in a separate and not very harmonious way. They are stressing the need to maintain close contacts, to coordinate their reactions to events in Poland.

That leaves the indications of what the allies might do--on the political, diplomatic, economic and even military planes--should the worst happen. The European Council has already indicated in the strongest terms in Luxembourg 2 December that East-West relations as a whole would be seriously affected. Should details be given? There was much discussion in Brussels Wednesday about a list of possible economic sanctions drawn up by the Americans and submitted for comment to their interlocutors. There is no doubt that several countries, notably France, do not think it appropriate to publish now a list of retaliatory measures which would be adopted if the situation were to deteriorate.

The French indicate that they do not want to have their hands tied by prior announcement of reaction to an event which has not occurred and which everybody wants to prevent. They are anxious not to give the impression that they think the Soviet intervention is certain and prefer to leave the nature of a possible retaliation "vague." Even though it is understandable that Mr Muskie's entourage wants him to leave the administration with the image of a determined man, for domestic policy reasons, it does not seem that the present secretary of state intends to force his allies' hands. In any case, when the Atlantic council meeting opened there were no lists of sanctions submitted by the United States and, it has been said, the problem had not been raised, or had been raised on a secondary level, during the dinner attended by the four.

QUAI D'ORSAY HITS SPANISH MINISTER'S REMARKS

[Text] Questioned on Thursday, 4 December about Spanish Interior Minister Roson's statement that he has a network of informers in the French Basque country, the Quai d'Orsay spokesman stated:

"The remarks made the Spanish interior minister and reported by the press are in clear violation of the rules of international law and are, therefore, unacceptable. The government warns the Spanish authorities against any use of French territory to try and solve an internal Spanish problem.

"With regard to the three individuals who illegally crossed the border at Hendaye 23 November, [foreign minister] Francois-Poncet asked the Spanish ambassador in Paris, 27 November for these people to be identified, sought and, if necessary, prosecuted by the Spanish authorities.

"The government expects specific answers to be given to these questions and for the Spanish authorities to conform to the conventions existing between the two countries".

PCP LEADERSHIP COMMENTS ON ELECTION RESULT

LD151635 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 11 Dec 80 p 3

[PCP Political Commission 8 December note: "The PCP and the Results of the Presidential Election"]

[Text] 1. The results of the presidential election constitute a resounding defeat for the reactionary forces and for their subversive plan.

With General Eanes' victory, the imminent threat of the total seizure of the state bodies by the reactionary forces—which would have enabled them to embark on an offensive aimed at the complete elimination of the gains of April [1974] and of the democratic system—has been dispelled.

2. General Soares Carneiro's candidacy was fully identified with the "Democratic Alliance." Soares Carneiro's defeat means that the Portuguese people have firmly condemned with their votes the policy of the "Democratic Alliance" and of its government.

3. The defeat for the "Democratic Alliance" and for its candidate is to be highlighted all the more insofar as it is true that the "Democratic Alliance" government abused power for electoral ends, monopolized television, radio and other news media, carried out large-scale intimidation operations, conducted a campaign of slanders against the democratic forces and against candidate Ramalho Eanes, shamefully exploited with electioneering ends the feelings aroused by the disaster which claimed the lives of the prime minister and defense minister and perpetrated countless irregularities and frauds [chapeladas].

If these abnormalities had not occurred, it is absolutely certain that General Eanes' victory and the defeat of the "Democratic Alliance" candidate would have been even more overwhelming.

The voting in the presidential election acquires the significance of a national demonstration in defense of the Portugal of April.

4. The election results also demonstrate the discredit and foundering of leftism. The spectacular failure of the candidacy of Otelo S. de Carvalho, who was supported by the Popular Democratic Union, and the ridiculous poll for Aires Rodrigues constitute a severe blow to verbal pseudorevolutionaryism, its political irresponsiblity and the illusions which it seeks to create.

5. The poll for Ramalho Eanes, which have him victory, demonstrates the electorate's clear realization of the dangers of democracy and the imperative need to bar the way to the the reactionary forces by defeating their candidate for the Presidency of the republic. The way in which party members, workers and democrats responded in such a complex situation to the threat and challenge of fascism and reaction demonstrates the Portuguese people's high political awareness and their determination to defend the democratic system.

6. The Political Commission emphasizes that the defeat of reaction was possible because of the converging of the wishes and votes of the most varied democratic sectors. The "Democratic Alliance's" election defeat does not mean that the dangers to democracy have been dispelled. The struggle continues. Unity among all democrats is imperative in order to finally defeat reaction's plans. The Political Commission emphasizes how important it is that the great lesson of the presidential election help the Portuguese democrats resolve the grave problems persisting in political life.

7. The Political Commission calls a Central Committee plenum for 11 December to examine the results of the presidential election and determine the policy in the new stage of Portuguese political life resulting from it.

CARRILLO CITED ON PCE 'CRISIS', INTERPARTY ISSUES

LD151701 Madrid ABC in Spanish 11 Dec 80 p 6

[Text] Aviles-PCE Secretary General Santiago Carrillo stated in Aviles yesterday: "I wish to say, once and for all, that there is no crisis in the PCE." "I do not wish to continue debating publicly," he added, "with Mr Tamames. I will say absolutely nothing, except that the controversy will assume proportions which it does not have at present. Tamames is my friend and my comrade, and within the party we will debate the problems which, so they say, stand between us."

When asked about the appointment of his deputy in the party Carrillo said: "I am not going to appoint anybody. What I did was to submit a proposal for the appointment of a deputy secretary general, with a view to his replacing me in the event of illness or absence from the country and concerning himself most particularly with the functioning of the party's collective leadership bodies."

On the disagreements existing within the Spanish political parties he stated: "The only one which has none is Fraga's party. I believe that it still has no grave problems because the Popular Alliance is still nothing much. When it is larger it will have some problems."

With regard to terrorism and relations between France and Spain Carrillo stated: "France does not have much right to protest against methods which are not in fact very correct on the part of Spain, because the fact is that France used them in the past, when General de Gaulle's secret agents shot down the Secret Army Organization terrorists, choosing as the place not only their own country but also the FRG and other countries. For this reason nobody can cast the first stone."

Referring to the country's problems he said: "The great problems borne by the Spanish state--the autonomies, unemployment and terrorism--should be taken into consideration by a government with a new majority, comprising the Union of the Democratic Center and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party, which the PCE would be prepared to support from outside."

"But this would be provided that we were party to the program laid down, because we believe that a government constituted thus would have more than sufficient strength to tackle these grave problems which are harming the survival of the Spanish democratic system. What we cannot continue doing is to create a power vacuum as large as the present one."

SCANDINAVIAN TRADE UNION ON POLISH SITUATION

Norwegian Trade Union Federation Chairman Tor Halvorsen also pointed out that the Scandinavian Trade Union Federation had already adopted a cautious line in the statement that was approved in August. NORWAY

NORDLI WELCOMES CHANCE FOR BETTER CONTACTS WITH EEC

LD151023 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 22 Nov 80 p 5

[Prime Minister Odvar Nordli "Saturday Guest" column article: "Norway--The European Community"]

[Text] It is now more than 8 years since we had the harrowing debate on Norway's relationship to the EEC. The referendum settled this debate and laid the foundation for Norway's future relations with the EEC.

But it goes without saying that the referendum result did not mean the rejection of active Norwegian participation in the shaping of European cooperation. Norway is a European country and our future is inextricably tied to Europe's development--political, economic and cultural.

We entered into a trade agreement with the Community. Through it we became a member of a great European free trade area which embraces more than 300 million people. On this foundation our trade with the Community has grown both in size and breadth in recent years. More than 70 percent of our exports go to the nine Community members, while 50 percent of our imports come from them.

Over the years which have passed since the referendum there have been far-reaching developments both within the Community and in Norway. These developments make it necessary to think through the structure and content of our relations with the Community.

Between the Community nations there has grown ever closer cooperation on economic and foreign policy questions. This has led to increased involvement by the Community not only in our part of the world but also globally. The European Community has developed into an increasingly important element in international developments. At a time when the process of detente has been greatly weakened this European voice is of special importance.

The imminent expansion of the Community to include three new countries, Greece, Portugal and Spain, is a historic event for Europe. It underlines once again the Community's role as an economic and political driving force and as a guardian of the democratic system in our part of the world.

But developments in Norway have also led to changes in our relations with the EEC. Our position as a modern industrial nation has been further strengthened, partly as a result of activities connected with our oil and gas resources. This has given new impetus to cooperation which has increased the mutual dependence between Norway and the other European nations.

This is the background to the initiative we took to create concrete cooperation in a number of fields outside the trade agreement, such as environmental protection, energy, industry, transportation, development aid and economic policy. We attach special importance to greater cooperation between the European nations on economic policy in the light of the alarming increase in unemployment and inflation.

But these new fields of cooperation and the European Community's increasingly important role internationally indicate that we should appraise the need for new forms of contact with the EEC and with its individual members without prejudice.

During my visit to Brussels recently the Commission presented a proposal for informal annual meetings between the Commission and Norway at the political level to discuss questions of mutual interest in the areas of economy and trade.

I reacted positively to this proposal, which I believe will be the foundation of cooperation of great significance for us, both concerning questions covered by the trade agreement and in the new areas of cooperation I have mentioned. Parallel with this we are making preparations for an intensification of our connections with the Community nations' foreign policy cooperation.

The aim behind these new forms of cooperations is to acquire as comprehensive information as possible about developments inside the Community and to ensure that Norwegian views are taken into consideration when the Community is shaping its measures and views in both the economic and foreign policy fields.

I feel sure that such a functional and pragmatic development of contacts with the Community are in the Norwegian interest and that there is broad support for this as part of an active Norwegian policy in Europe.

It must be a general principle, but especially in our part of the world, that we do not sit like passive onlookers viewing other nations' policies but actively attempt to participate in their formation.

NEGOTIATIONS COMPLETED ON SWEDISH MISSILE PURCHASE

LD151627 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 28 Nov 80 p 11

[Excerpt] The Norwegian defense forces have this week completed negotiations on parts of a contract for the purchase of Swedish air defense missiles for around 40 million kroner. The majority of those RB 80 antiaircraft missiles will be sent to the North Norway Brigade, but according to information given to AFTENPOSTEN army commanders are also considering equipping the garrison in Porsanger with some. If this is the case it will be the first time military units in Finnmark will have had air defense missiles at their disposal.

The missiles, which will be supplied by the Swedish Bofors Company, are short-range, limited to 5 kilometers. The missiles are fired from the ground at attacking aircraft, and are guided to their target with the aid of a laser beam and a gyrostabilized optical rangefinder. The firing unit with its missile can be dismantled and three men can carry the parts on their backs.

FOREIGN OFFICE MEETING WITH 'ARAFAT REPORTED

[John Bulloch report: "'Arafat Sees Foreign Office Man"]

[Text] A senior Foreign Office representative has held a secret meeting with Yasir 'Arafat, the Palestinian leader, as part of Lord Carrington's policy of moving closer to the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO). It emerged yesterday that Sir John Graham, deputy under-secretary in charge of the Middle East, met Yasir 'Arafat in Beirut on Dec 2. Sir John was accompanied by Mr Ben Strachan, British ambassador in the Lebanon, and with Mr 'Arafat was the PLO "foreign minister", Faruq Qaddumi.

In Beirut at the time, strenuous efforts were made to conceal the fact that the meeting was taking place. I was told that Sir John Graham was to be out of Beirut on that day as he was making a tour of the troubled south of Lebanon. Lord Carrington took the same position in a letter he sent to Mr Steel, the Liberal leader.

The Foreign Office said last night that Sir John Graham's meeting with Mr 'Arafat "does not signify any change in our general attitude to the Middle East question or to the PLO in particular." The statement said that Sir John was on "a familiarisation visit" to the area, and also went to Jordan, Syria, and the West Bank.

Official British attitude reflects that of the European community, expressed after the Venice summit meeting early this year. This called for the PLO to be "associated" with any Middle East peace talks, but did not give the organisation any special recognition or status.

CARRINGTON ENDORSES LIBERAL PARTY REPORT ON PLO

[John Bulloch report: "Carrington Backs Steel's Report on Status of PLO"]

[Text] Lord Carrington, foreign secretary, and his two senior ministers have endorsed the main points of a report on the Middle East by Mr David Steel, the Liberal Party leader, in which he supports the Palestine Liberation Organisation's claim to be the representative of the Palestinian people. The official British Government position is that the PLO must be "associated with" many Middle East negotiations, but the organisation is not afforded any official recognition or status.

In his 15,000-word report following a Middle East tour, Mr Steel set out as his first point that any settlement in the area would have to ensure acceptance of the state of Israel within internationally recognized borders. But Mr Steel offered little further encouragement to the Jewish state. He advocated recognition of the PLO, accepted the Palestinians' right to a homeland in the West Bank of the Jordan and in Gaza, said that the bill by which Israel had annexed Jerusalem had no validity, and said that bilateral negotiations between Israel and Jordan could never settle the problem.

In a letter published this week, Lord Carrington seemed to accept all these points. The letter was published in one Arabic language paper in London, and one English-language Arab newspaper.

The letter from Lord Carrington to Mr Steel said: "Thank you very much for your letter of Nov 17 and for sending us copies of the report of your Middle East tour. Sir Ian Gilmour (lord privy seal) and Douglas Hurd (minister of state) were also interested to see the report and I am replying on behalf of us all.

"If I may say so, the report is an excellent piece of work. The department has read it with great interest, and we would not take issue with any of your main conclusions."

This apparent endorsement of the Liberal Party leader's views on the Middle East seemed to cause considerable embarrassment at the Foreign Office last night. A spokesman said that there had been no change in British policy. The spokesman suggested that Lord Carrington's letter had been "loosely worded," and said that interpretation of it would depend on what were considered the main points of Mr Steel's report.

However, the Liberal leader's report clearly set out his main conclusions, and his aides had no doubt what they were. Arab diplomats in London also saw no difficulty in working out the desire of all senior Foreign Office ministers to take a more positive attitude towards the Palestinian question.

One Palestinian told me: "We have always believed that senior British ministers wanted to move further and faster than the Americans would allow them to. Lord Carrington's letter seems to us to be proof of this.

'MOST ADVANCED' MISSILE SYSTEM TO BE CANCELED

LD151533 London THE DAILY TELEGRAPH in English 15 Dec 80 pp 1, 24

[Air Cdre G.S. Cooper report: "RAF Super Missile Faces Axe"]

[Excerpt] Sea Eagle, Britain's most advanced missile system, is about to be cancelled. Other important weapon projects, including an improved version of the RAF's air defence missile, Sky Flash Mark 2, may also be swept away in a drastic review of defence equipment expenditure. No decisions have yet been finalised, a Defence Ministry spokesman confirmed yesterday, but reports from industry sources strongly suggest that equipment cancellations and postponements are imminent.

As reported exclusively in THE DAILY TELEGRAPH on Nov 28 the 350 million pound Sea Eagle programme has reached the flight test stage, attached to a British aerospace Buccaneer. Cancellation of the advanced technology antiship missile, which was ordered last year as a TV Martel replacement for use by the RAF and fleet air arm, will effectively put a stop to what has been promisingly described as the forerunner of Britain's own cruise missile for tactical use over land as well as at sea. The 75 million pound development of Sky Flash was announced just before this year's defence white paper, in which it was included as an important improvement to Britain's air defences.

Aircraft replacement programmes are also expected to suffer severely from the government decision to contain the 5,000 million pound expenditure on the Trident nuclear missile system within published defence budget totals. If defence funds cannot be increased substantially to offset the expense of Trident, the RAF has little hope of getting new aircraft to replace Jaguars and Harriers before the completion of the programme in the 1990s. A Sea King anti-submarine helicopter replacement for the Royal Navy will also be ruled out.

The leakage of confidential Defence Ministry documents in October made it clear then that funds to replace these three types of aircraft could be regarded as "wholly inadequate." Reductions in defence expenditure have given rise to mounting concern in Britain's aerospace industry as industrialists and military observers assess the long-term effects on planned equipment programmes.

Fears are growing that cancellations and postponements will become inevitable as a combined consequence of cutbacks in the base level of the defence budget, a reduction in the rate of increase in defence spending and the massive reallocation of resources to Trident.

KIPRIANOU LEAVES FOR LUXEMBOURG, UK VISIT

[Text] This morning, President Kiprianou left for a visit to Luxembourg and Britain, where he will have talks with both prime ministers on questions of common interest, with special emphasis on the second phase of Cyprus' association with the EEC. In a statement prior to his departure, the president said that the Cypriot side would exert every effort to secure better conditions--particularly in connection with Cypriot exports to the EEC--than those in the past. He also said that he would brief the prime ministers of both countries on the latest Cypriot developments and that he would also discuss bilateral questions with Mrs Thatcher. He added that Britain, being a Commonwealth country, a former colonial power, a guarantor power and a member of the Security Council, bore a special responsibility for Cyprus. The president voiced the hope that his talks in both countries would be useful.

In Britain, Kiprianou will also meet with opposition party leader Foot as well as with leading members of the Cypriot community there. The president will return to Cyprus on 23 December. Kiprianou was seen off at Larnaca Airport by House President Mikhailidhis, who will be acting president of Cyprus during his absence, the British high commissioner, the council of ministers, house members and the chiefs of the national guard and police.

EDEK ISSUES RESOLUTION ON TALKS, ECONOMY, BASES

[Text] The socialist party EDEK Central Committee has released a resolution on the recent developments. Concerning the intercommunal talks, the resolution reiterates that they should be substantive, concrete talks within the principles stipulated by the UN resolutions. It also criticizes the fact that the Cypriot issue will not be debated by this year's UN General Assembly which, as the resolution maintains, would lead to the deinternationalization of the Cypriot issue.

The resolution then goes on to note that the country's national liberation circumstances dictate the establishment of a broad national salvation front and also supports socioeconomic changes that would place the country's resources in the service of the entire people and the struggle. In conclusion, the resolution calls for the dissolution of all foreign military bases in Cyprus.

GOVERNMENT DENIES EXPULSION OF SOVIET ATTACHE

[Text] The government is not aware of plots to murder or kidnap political personalities. This was stressed yesterday by authoritative sources in reference to reports published in a morning newspaper yesterday. According to the same source the cultural attache of the Soviet Embassy in Athens was not expelled--as reported by the same newspaper--but he left on termination of his tour of duty after about 7 years service in Athens.

In reference to special security measures by police authorities, it was explained that special security measures are being adopted at this period because December is related to the murder activities by extremists (Welch, Bambalis and so forth), in the recent past.

PRIME MINISTER ADDRESSES FOREIGN CORRESPONDENTS

NC122114 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1800 GMT 12 Dec 80

[From the radio Newsreel program: Reportage on Greek Prime Minister Rallis' 12 December address to foreign correspondents in Athens]

[Text] Greece's foreign policy is a policy of peace and international cooperation, stressed Prime Minister Rallis in his address today during a luncheon by foreign press correspondents in Greece at the Grande Bretagne Hotel. Addressing the foreign press correspondents, Mr Rallis said:

[Begin recording] Ladies and gentlemen: Greece's foreign policy is a policy of peace and international cooperation. We are proving this every day in all directions. We support every effort for the restoration of a climate of confidence in the world because we believe that only within such a climate can international cooperation be really developed, whether political, economic or technological. We believe that the so-called balance of power, at the lowest possible level, constitutes the safest guarantee for safeguarding peace. In this way it would be possible to avoid an arms race which not only exposes international security to danger, but also undermines the economic and social policy of the various states. We are working for international detente, but at the same time we believe that if it is to be effective it needs, everywhere, the sincere and practical contribution of all.

Greece has been applying its beliefs in both its geographical area and in the broader international area. Following the restoration of democracy, it was Greece that originated the initiative for Balkan cooperation in specialized economic and technical fields. This cooperation among countries with different political, economic and social regimes is possible because it is based on the principle of mutual respect and of non-intervention in internal affairs. It constitutes a contribution to the more general policy of detente, and its success presupposes that any third country intervention in the Balkan area can be avoided.

It is true that in recent months there was some inactivity in connection with this cooperation. The recent visits of the president of the republic to three Balkan capitals, however, has provided a fresh impetus, the results of which will become obvious, I hope, during the next few months.

In our relations with Turkey, which constitutes an important chapter in our foreign policy, I perceive some improvement of the climate. This improvement--although it has not yet been transformed into substantive arrangements--is not without importance. The atmosphere within which international relations are developing is a factor whose value must not be underestimated.

As for the substance, Greece believes that the settlement of pending issues must basically be dependent on international law and international practice, which constitute the most stable foundations of international society. The problems of airspace have been simplified by withdrawing the controversial NOTAMS and by Greece's reintegration into NATO's military wing. Our country is willing to examine questions connected with air navigation in the Aegean airspace--to facilitate air navigation for those who are using this airspace--within the framework of responsibilities for control and security of air traffic which, according to international arrangements, have been undertaken by the Athens FIR [Flight Information Region]. The exercise of these responsibilities, always on the basis of international arrangements, entails certain authorities and certain rights to which Greece naturally remains firmly devoted.

On the question of the settlement of the continental shelf, Greece believes that international law and international practice constitute the most stable mainstays for a fair and reasonable settlement. The law of the sea, which the UN conference has been working out for some years, might help resolve this. The dialogue is the proper way to find an outlet. It is the primary means for the peaceful settlement of disputes to which the states resort, but always preserve as [words indistinct] security the likelihood of resorting to a judicial settlement or a settlement through arbitration in case of failure of the dialogue. This stand is neither a novelty nor a peculiarity, since it has behind it many international precedents.

The pending issues between Greece and Turkey may be viewed differently by each side with regard to the object, the regulations and the ways of settlement, but they are parts of one whole that defines Greek-Turkish relations. From this point of view, the serious problems are not unconnected.

Of course, Greece is not participating in the intercommunal talks under the UN secretary general's auspices--talks which aim at settling the Cyprus problem. However, it is watching these talks with unabated interest and it is giving the Cypriot Government its wholehearted political and diplomatic support. It would be commonplace to add that the honorable and fair solution of the Cyprus problem would have favorable repercussions on Greek-Turkish relations, for which it would open a new chapter. [end recording]

The prime minister then referred to the situation in the Middle East. After voicing Greece's uneasiness over the war between Iran and Iraq, he added:

[Begin recording] Greece's recent reintegration into NATO's military wing has been an important development. With this reintegration our country again found its old position in the alliance, despite the fact that NATO has placed under its command a small part of the Greek forces. Greece has regained the advantages of full membership from the point of view of supplies, training, reinforcing the infrastructure and so forth. Along with this, unity has been restored and the gap in the southeastern wing of NATO has been closed; this is to the general benefit of the alliance and, moreover, to the benefit of the countries in the region.

The restoration of Greece's position in the alliance, to which we have continually belonged since 1952, did not have nor could it have any negative repercussions on any point in our foreign policy. The other consequence of the return to the military structure of the alliance is the prospect of concluding a new agreement on U.S. military facilities on Greek territory, facilities that can only operate for NATO purposes. We aim at an agreement with a broad base of defensive support and economic and technological cooperation in the war industry field.

The new agreement will incorporate provisions of the Greek-American [agreement] that was initialed in 1977 in connection with the legal status of the military installations and of the Americans serving in them. The new agreement will replace the current [state of affairs] which has been outdated by developments. I hope that next week we will be in a position to submit a plan on the main part of the agreement and later present the text of geographical appendices for [each base].

The development of multilateral diplomacy gives small countries, with broad concerns and interests, the possibility to play a role in international organizations disproportionate to their size. Greece is properly utilizing this possibility in the UN forum and the UN specialized organizations, and recently at the Madrid conference. The policy that Greece voices is proof of its devotion to the principles of the UN Charter and its belief in human values that constitute the nucleous of its cultural heritage.

Looking toward the future, I would say that Greece's accession to the European Community provides it with prerequisites and means to deal with difficulties of a political and economic nature that become, every day, more acute. In an unstable and conflicting world, Greece will find itself within a stable framework, the European Community, in order to develop its national entity and to face pressing problems.

Greece's accession has been based on both political and economic assessments. Politically, the accession creates prerequisites to safeguard Greece's sovereign rights, to consolidate its democratic institutions, and to strengthen its international role. As an equal member of a strong community, and with its weight on the international stage strengthened, Greece will be able to better withstand any probable outside pressures.

Economically, accession to the EEC will definitely contribute to the highest possible prosperity for all the strata of people, and to the modern organization of the Greek economy and society. The net financial benefit from the Community's budget will increase the income of the peasants and of the working people in general. The financial assistance of the Community will lead more quickly and more safely to the rejuvenation and modernization of the country's economic and social structure.

Along with this, the Community, for its part, will benefit from Greece's accession. From the political point of view, with Greece as the 10th member the Community's presence in the delicate region of the eastern Mediterranean and the Middle East will be broadened and strengthened. In this way more favorable prerequisites will be created for [deepening] EEC relations with the countries in this region.

Beyond this, Greece is an important market for the Community since the percentage of the Community exports to Greece is already much higher than that to Australia or Canada. With Greece's accession, the EEC becomes the No 1 maritime power in the world. With our accession, the participation of the Community's merchant marine fleet in the world economy wil be increased from 20 percent to about 34 percent. In few words, Greece's accession to the European Community is already vindicated by the general political and economic developments in the European and the broader interntional region and the region closer to our national area. I thank you. [applause] [end recording]

KKE-INTERIOR, CHINESE COMMUNIST PARTY STATEMENT

AT150915 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1930 GMT 14 Dec 80

[Text] The Chinese Communist Party and the KKE-Interior proclaimed their resolve to increase cooperation and contacts between them for the benefit, as stated, of the working class of the two countries. Beijing Radio reported today that in a joint statement the two parties agreed that intervention by one communist party into the internal affairs of another is unacceptable and that relations between the various communist parties must be based on equality and mutual respect.

KKE-INTERIOR PRESENTS BASIC POLICY QUESTIONS

AT151100 Athens I AVYI in Greek 14 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Editorial by Leonidhas Kirkos, chamber deputy representing the "alliance" of progressive and leftwing forces, and member of the KKE-Interior: "Comrades of the other Communist Party."]

[Excerpts] As the international horizon darkens and the small Greek ship of state labors in the middle of the storm which rages in our area, we the Communists have to speak out loudly, publicly, face to face with the working class and the workers of our fatherland. We must speak cleanly, without abuse, without bile while looking over the course which each one of us points out as the way to our country's progress.

Right from its first steps the Communist Party was the spark which would have started the fire of democratic and socialist revolution in Greece and later--during the occupation [German] years--it was the peoples' leader in their struggle for national and social liberation. The KKE-Interior clearly described what happened so that the KKE toppled from the summits on which it was to the depths of defeat. You never said anything. You never wanted to educate the working class of our fatherland on the specific mistakes it had to avoid in the future. This is because those who lead you never wanted to be educated and to learn. They are now ready to commit the very same mistakes.

Who is to blame as the Communists Get Pushed Into a Corner?

What is the position of the Communist movement today? If we want to look the truth straight in the eye we must then sweep aside Communist fanfares and pseudo-dialectics: The Communist movement is being relentlessly pushed into a corner so that it can be squeezed out of the political game. With time it will be squeezed more and more. At the same time PASOK must abandon the visions of socialist change and it must come to earth. It must become more "realistic so that it will be in a position to exercise authority." The Greek bourgeois class has a vast experience and even vaster international support. It knows very well that a normal democratic state of affairs is the worst prerequisite for its perpetuation and sovereignty. It is the worst prerequisite under one condition; provided that a communist party, inspired, modern, democratic and disciplined, stands opposite it and is able to break down the barriers of isolation and its able to pour out among the broad masses of the workers.

Who is it that relegates the Communist Party into the corner? The leaders of the other Communist Party will state: but none other than the enemy. During their internal discussions, they also include PASOK in this class and in this way they return to the old Zakhariadhis formulas (and this is the reason for their reference to mistakes): First Plastiras the "bulwark against change," then G. Papandreou in 1961 and 64 and Andreas most certainly tomorrow.

What do we of the KKE-Interior have to say? We say that the causes--over and beyond the enemy's pressure--must be sought within the Communist movement; in its line, in the attraction of its ideas, in its unification practices. If all these are based on a sound foundation then no power can force them into any corner. If all this fails to convince, however, then both the enemy and the opponent within the progressive area will both benefit and the movement will be forced into a corner.

Six Implacable Questions Demand an Answer

Comrades of the other KKE: Check your line and your methods; do not be carried away by the 10 percent you received in those other elections by beguiling old and new communists, by using the unlimited support which the other "brother parties" give you. This line and these methods of yours, able perhaps to inspire fanaticism within a minority, cannot convince the vast masses of the people whose confidence must be won over by the Communists.

1. Comrades, what do you have to say about Poland?

What is your answer to the workers who ask: How is it that after 40 years of the "authority of the working class" such a great proportion of this working class now expresses its discomfort because it was ignored, overlooked and suffers? What would you say if--we hope it never happens--the Soviet divisions come in, as they did in Czehcoslovakia, in order to support, always in the name of the Polish people, a form of socialism which cannot find support among the Polish people? Will you say that the Soviets acted well and that the tanks are the embodiment of proletarian internationalism? Will you say that Gierek was to blame? Was it the counterrevolutionaries or the imperialists who were to blame? If truly all these were in fact to blame, then what did the party do? This was the party that was as worthy of being spat upon as your own party! This was the party which suppressed every form of protest and criticism--both within it and outside! This was the party that sought its support among the bureaucrats and not the laborers but which today fights--and has all our support--in order to regain the confidence of the working class, a confidence of which it was deprived for years thanks to methods which are similar to your own methods. What will you say then and whom will you convince?

2. Comrades, what do you have to to say about democratic liberties?

What do you have to say about personal rights, about the freedom of information of research and of art? What do you have to say about the right to strike? Do you guarantee that you will respect all this if you come to authority? How do you demonstrate your respect to all this in your daily practices? Will you, for example, do it under the theory that "the truth is what benefits the people" which has been used to cover up crimes as well as distortions of history?

3. What do you have to say about division and about unity?

Most of the ordinary people in our fatherland, communists or leftists say, "Man, if the party were united, what miracles we could work!" What do you say? Is there for you a problem of division and, as a result, a problem of unity? For us such a problem does exist and we have declared it in all keys that we want unity in action, we want open dialogue and criticism, we want the unity of the communist movement on the basis of the principles of revival. Do you know what you are saying? You say: "We will crush them. They are revisionists and traitors, agents of the bourgeois class." It is within such a climate that you inspire fanaticism among the young, the members of the communist youth, turning them into tools of a policy which incessantly makes division deeper to the degree that the bourgeois class rubs its palms with pleasure.

What do you have to say to all this? At a time that you have such abysmal hatred for your comrade, whom will you be able to convince that you will have a more democratic behavior for some other ally not subjugated to you?

4. What about the unity of democratic forces?

What do you have to say comrades about the unity of democratic forces? Do you remember when some time ago the chairman of PASOK took the initiative--that we should all sit around a table--what did you have to say then? You said, "with them, the 'so-called Interior', never!" In this way you destroyed an important democratic process and you continue to destroy it. Do you remember what we had to say? We said, "we will sit both with those --of the other Communist Party--and with everyone else because the question is not what separates us but what unites us." This is our difference. Whom will you, comrades in the leadership of the other Communist Party, be able to convince that it is worthwhile to support your divisive policy?

5. Who Is Helped by Maximalism?

Have a look, comrades, on some examples of your position on "small" matters which have great political importance:

A. Last year you were against the occupation of university buildings and you even beat up many who took part in such occupations before you did. Those occupations of buildings were undertaken on a broad mass basis. This year you are the ones who utilized occupation of university buildings but without the great mass of the students. Who is helped by your Maximalist policy, "all or nothing?"

B. During the incidents of the Polytechnic march the KKE-Interior was the target of barbaric attacks from the security forces. What did you say that night in your official statements? You said absolutely nothing! In your statement you started with the anarchist and criminal elements and the government's responsibilities were left behind.

C. The ministry of Social Services prepared a health bill. It does have merit. It has certain good points which are opposed by the most reactionary wing of "New Democracy" and the "great medical establishment." Each law is not the end of a struggle. It is only a phase of the struggle. If such a law does not attempt to turn us back to a more authoritarian state of affairs, a more antipeople state of affairs, then it merits a different treatment, which must be inspired and mass supported. One of your arguments was: "The bill is cut and sewn to the measures of the EEC." We wish it had been because to date the countries of the EEC with Britain in the vanguard all have health services ranging from well organized to nationalized services. This is a conquest of the workers and not of the monopolies. Because the cost of such services deprives the monopolies of funds, the rightwing governments fight to abolish them. Who is helped by such arguments? The EEC may have a thousand vulnerable points--and we rally the struggle against them--but health is not one of them. This, according to you, is a "gift" of the Greek monopolistic bourgeois class. The responsibilities of this class, however, are hidden under your slogan that everything which is not right must be blamed on the EEC--because this is the dictate of the simplistic "line" of the "party" which does not try to awaken the conscience of the working class, which fails to create revolutionaries, that is people who think by themselves--true pioneers--and which wants followers, fighters, obedient executive officials devoted to the working class but always under the line of thinking which the leaders dictate.

6. And now we come to the most implacable question: What if the line of course of these leaders is wrong?

Is there a single communist who did not believe Stalin? Is there anyone today who fails to see the abyss opened up by his mistakes and the basic aspects of his thinking on the establishment of socialism in a given country?

Is there a Chinese Communist who failed to deify Mao? Is there anyone today who fails to see the calamities brought about by his "Cultural Revolution" in China? Is there a Polish Communist who did not place his hopes in Gierek after the fall of Gomulka?

Comrades of the other Communist Party: Do you not understand that it is only when the myth of the infallible leaders is destroyed; that it is only when the correct democratic relationship between mass-class-party-leadership is restored; that it is only when the party is refreshed by the ideas of creative-critical Marxism and only when it authentically becomes a collective leader, a fact which means radical changes in its authoritarian-bureaucratic structure; that it is only then that a new wind will blow to give new impetus to the communist movement? The KKE-Interior which emerged from the rift with your basically reactionary monolithism, is taking steps, in the midst of vastly difficult conditions, toward a new form of party structure which, by strengthening the positive elements of the experience gained by "new type" parties will place them on a new foundation for a more direct involvement of the entire party in the function of leadership.

Which agent within the communist movement could win the broad masses?

The other Communist Party made the "17 percent ratio" for its entry into the second distribution [of seats within the Chamber of Deputies] its central slogan. Why, however, should the communist or leftwing voter support it? What did the 10 percent which it received in the last election produce? Did it strengthen it organizationally? Yes it did this but what did it do politically? It only contributed to pushing the Communists into a corner.

A. The strengthening of the other Communist Party at the expense of the KKE-Interior only deepened the division within the communist movement because it helped its leaders imagine that they could make us disappear. If, to the contrary, it is the KKE-Interior which had received the 10 percent, then the road toward the unification of the communist movement would have been opened. This is because we would have led the "others" by "the ear" and we would have forced them to joint action, to open debate. face to face before the working class, to an open criticism of ideas and practices for the sake of unity based upon the victory of revivalist ideas. In such an eventuality they would not have been able to avoid it because neither slander nor verbal abuse would have been acceptable.

B. Strengthening the other Communist Party only hinders the process of a united march by the democratic forces. Truly which agency of the communist movement could facilitate such cooperation? Could it be the agent originating in authoritarian enforce who thinks only in terms of enforcement and drowns the free movement of ideas under dogmatic fossilization or could it be the agent of the KKE-Interior which represents the authentic Grecian search for innovation of the communist movement which connects socialism to democracy, the authority of the working class to self administration, the defeat of the authority of the monopolies to the widest alliance of social and political forces which support change?

Truly which agent of the Communist movement could contribute to the awakening and unification of the broadest possible masses of Greek society which thirst for change and democratic renewal?

There can only be one crushing answer. Both at the polls, whenever they are set up, and in daily struggles, the working class, the workers, will bear the responsibility for their own choice.

The strengthening of the KKE-Interior, an increase of its strength both among the masses and in the Chamber of Deputies, will mean a contribution to progress through calm, without destructive backsliding and new calamities like the ones for which an entire nation has been paying. At the same time, this would mean the nation would be writing the most important pages of its modern history.

JAPAN'S ITO HOLDS MEETING WITH CHANCELLOR SCHMIDT

[Text] Bonn, Dec 15 (KYODO)--West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt met with Japanese Foreign Minister Masayoshi Ito for some two hours Monday and requested Ito to convey to Prime Minister Zenko Suzuki his formal invitation to visit West Germany. Ito's meeting with Schmidt originally was scheduled to last about an hour.

At the outset of the meeting, Ito presented to the chancellor a letter from Suzuki. Schmidt noted that he had maintained close ties with former Prime Ministers Takeo Fukuda and Masayoshi Ohira and hoped that such close relations would be maintained also with Suzuki. He then asked Ito to convey his invitation to Suzuki to visit West Germany.

Ito replied he will relay the invitation to Suzuki and expressed the hope that the visit will materialize at an early date. Schmidt told the foreign minister he hoped that close ties between Japan and West Germany and Japan and Europe will be further promoted in the future.

On the U.S. request that its allies make efforts to improve their defense capability, Schmidt said that serious efforts should be made in this respect depending on the situation although there were various problems involved. The chancellor also referred to the Japan-Europe economic friction and said the functions of global economy will be damaged if trade protectionism rises to the surface. Therefore, he stressed the need to protect free trade to the utmost.

Schmidt said friction between Japan and Europe should be solved by increasing exports of the European Community (EC) to Japan and not be restructing imports from Japan. He called on Japan to cooperate in this respect, noting that the Japanese market has not been completely opened as yet. Ito replied that Japan will make a serious study on dealing with the economic friction after fully hearing the views of the EC and stressed the need to uphold the free trade policy.

On the situation in Poland, Schmidt said whether the Soviet Union will intervene in that country depends on the internal situation in Poland. The foreign minister requested that Japan be contacted in advance on measures to be taken in respect to the Soviet Union.

Ito's meeting with Schmidt followed his talks with Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher the same day. With his visit to Bonn, Ito concluded his five-nation European tour which also took him to France, Britain, Belgium and the Netherlands. He is due to return to Tokyo on Saturday after visiting Cairo.

TV CORRESPONDENT IN USSR DENIED USE OF FACILITIES

[Text] Hamburg, 16 Dec (DPA)--ZDF [Television Channel Two]--announced today that the Soviet authorities have advised its Moscow correspondent Dirk Saager that during the next 10 days no technical facilities will be available for video circuits for reports on the situation in Poland. The ZDF newsroom also said tonight that this measure also applies to all Western correspondents. ZDF's news magazine "TODAY" will instead carry tonight a telephoned report by Saager.

CABINET INCREASES DEFENSE BUDGET FOR 1981

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Republic's defense budget will in the coming financial year receive an extra DM700 million. This was learned by DPA tonight after the Federal Cabinet's budget discussion in Bonn. The next Bundeswehr budget will thus amount to DM41.2 billion.

The total budget is DM224.7 billion. However, it seems that even the latest uplift for the defense budget will not reach the NATO aim of a real increase of 3 percent. It was learned that the extra money for the Bundeswehr has the purpose of somewhat lessening the financial woes of the Tornado multipurpose aircraft. The Tornado made a hole of DM533 million in the 1980 budget. In 1981 it will be DM800 million.

BERLIN REPRESENTATIVES TALK ON EXCHANGE MINIMUM

[Text] Berlin, 16 Dec (DPA)--The representative of the Berlin Senat for travel and tourism, Rainer Kunze, today again in East Berlin demanded that the GDR rescind its increase in and extension of the minimum exchange for visitors from the West. During a meeting with the GDR representative Walter Mueller, which took place at the request of the Senat, he drew attention to the reduction of visits by West Berliners to the eastern part of the city and to the GDR, which on average has amounted to 60 percent since the minimum exchange was increased. According to Deputy Senat Spokesman Joerg Henschel, Kunze also explained to the GDR representative the joint decision by the Chamber of Deputies--CDU SPD and FDP--to demand the reduction of the compulsory exchange.

During the meeting, which lasted nearly 3 hours, the Senat representative also pointed to problems connected with the compulsory exchange. For instance, there are no opportunities for visitors to shop over the weekend. The opening hours of exchange offices at the intracity crossing points are insufficient to enable visitors to deposit money which they have not spent from their compulsory exchange. The banks also no longer issue receipts when such sums are later withdrawn, so that it is difficult for visitors to prove that they have exchanged these sums legally. According to the Senat spokesman, in reply to the charges Mueller reiterated the GDR's standpoint on the question of the minimum exchange and described them as interference in the GDR's internal affairs. At the meeting he handed over the bus timetable for the Christmas period.

GDR Waives Some Requirements

[Text] Munich, 17 Dec (DPA)--Since Monday, business travelers to the GDR have apparently not had to pay the minimum exchange requirement or visa fees at the three Bavarian border road crossing points. According to the presidium of the Bavarian border police in Munich today, several surprised visitors have reported this since the beginning of the week. They showed the Bavarian frontier officials visas which bore the stamp "no charge." They also reported on returning from the GDR that they had been freed from the minimum exchange requirement.

The Bavarian border police have no explanation for the new GDR procedure toward business people. They simply took note of the statements by travelers. No new procedures have been reported so far at border railroad crossing points into the GDR.

MINISTER SEES NO PROSPECT OF DIALOGUE WITH GDR

[Text] Hamburg, 17 Dec (DPA)--Minister of State in the Federal Chancellor's Office Gunter Huonker stressed the Federal Government's basic readiness for talks with the GDR on the whole complex issue of intra-German relations. In an interview on German radio today, Huonker said he sees no immediate prospect, however, for such a dialogue. The reason for this, he said, is the present critical world political situation--including developments in Poland. It is important in this respect to avoid any additional upset in the European political climate.

Huonker stressed that the Federal Government still refuses to accept the increased minimum money exchange requirements for Western visitors to the GDR, nor can any moves in East Berlin be detected in this respect. With regard to GDR state and party leader Erich Honecker's offer of talks on arms limitation, the minister said this issue is a matter for the United States and Soviet Union. This problem too, however, like the exchange requirement, could be discussed between the two German states within the overall context of relations.

GENSCHER TO TALK WITH CSSR LEADERS IN PRAGUE

[Text] Bonn, 16 Dec (DPA)--East-West relations against the backdrop of developments in Poland, the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act on security and cooperation in Europe, and a number of unresolved bilateral questions will be the chief topics during Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher's 3-day official visit to Prague, which begins on Thursday. He will have 5 hours of talks with Czechoslovak Foreign Minister Bohsulav Chnoupek and also meet state and party head Gustav Husak and Premier Lubomir Strougal.

Genscher is the first Western politician to hold talks at this level in an East bloc capital since the NATO conference in Brussels and the Warsaw Pact summit meeting on the situation in Poland. Diplomatic circles in Bonn stressed today that considerable time will be devoted to the latest statements on Poland by the Warsaw Pact, NATO and the European Community. Bonn continues to regard the 5 December declaration by the East bloc summit in Moscow that the Warsaw Pact states trusted Poland to solve its problems itself, as the core of the statement. These sources also said that the Madrid CSCE follow-up conference would also be intensively discussed. Genscher would explain the West's attitude so that no "misunderstandings" could arise.

DIE WELT ON REACTIONS TO THREATS OF GDR'S FISCHER

[W. Hertz-Eichenrode editorial: "Fishing in Troubled Waters"]

[Text] The Federal Government is acting appropriately by reacting calmly to the threatening speech by "GDR" Foreign Minister Fischer given on Friday of last week. Yet nobody should allow themselves to be lulled into believing that Fischer went so far as to speak of consequences for the transit agreement and the basic treaty only because he was not yet familiar with the text of the communique which the foreign ministers of the 15 NATO states released in Brussels on the same Friday. The other way around makes more sense.

Fischer, a foreign minister with nearly 6 years of experience in that office, used unconfirmed and subsequently vehemently denied reports about a four-point plan by the Americans for political-economic reactions from the West to the feared military intervention by the Soviet Union in Poland to reel off his tirade, even before the Brussels communique deprived him of the basis of his polemics.

What is more, Fischer is bound to have coordinated his threat with Moscow, because the transit agreement between Bonn and East Berlin is but the implementation by the authorities of a provision of the four-power agreement on Berlin in which the Soviet Union assures the three Western powers that the transit traffic between Berlin and West Germany should not be inhibited but should be facilitated.

Obviously, the "GDR" sought some excuse, in conformity with Moscow if not on its orders, to threaten to annul the basic treaty and the transit agreement in the event of certain acts on the part of the NATO states in general and the Federal Republic if particular. This must be taken all the more seriously since the "GDR" thereby affects the four-power agreement which is supposed to guarantee the security of Berlin. This will not change even though East Berlin is using less harsh tones again.

It does not take much imagination to see that Fischer's agitation is addressed to Helmut Schmidt--probably recalling the fact that the chancellor in March of this year sought to convince the Americans that Bonn had to exercise a certain reserve in sanctions against the Soviet Union in reply to the invasion of Afghanistan. A large Soviet army, he argued in New York at the time, is just 50 kilometers from his home town of Hamburg: "And because this border between East and West has also divided our nation for the same amount of time I hope you will understand that my country and my government must always also keep in mind the destiny of our German compatriots on the other side and their desires and interests, and that, in view of our responsibility for the entire German nation, we cannot act either as a vanguard or as a spearhead." East Berlin intends to recommend this philosophy to the chancellor with extortive emphasis also for the event of Western sanctions in reaction to a military subjugation of Poland by the Soviet army. The reasons are obvious:

1. In the danger of ending up between the liberal Federal Republic of Germany and a Poland struggling for liberties, the salvation of his communist regime becomes for Honecker the absolute end in itself, the priority which pushes everything else aside.

2. Moscow can see that the West will indeed militarily respect, but no longer tolerate politically and economically, another execution of the Brezhnev doctrine within the Soviet sphere of influence in Europe like in 1953, 1956 and 1968. As Giscard d'Estaing once put it, the West in so doing refers to the "detente code," the "mutually agreed on code of good conduct." This includes, as the part most important to Europe, the four-power agreement on Berlin.

If East Berlin now threatens a violation of the basic treaty and the transit agreement and thus at least verbally calls the entire network of Willy Brandt's treaties with the East into question, people in Bonn then should recall the phrase with which Henry Kissinger in his memoirs critically comments on the start of the "new Ostpolitik:" "We were determined to endeavor to modify the latent incompatibility between Germany's national goals and its ties with the Atlantic and European communities."

Fischer's threatening speech is cause to gain a clear view of two states of fact:

First, since the detente policy and the treaties with the East were the dominant topic of the past decade, it turns out today that the power situation in Europe is exactly as it was prior to the treaties with the East. In no way different from the times of cold war, this power situation determines the practical policies of Moscow and of East Berlin whenever "essentials" of Soviet rule over half of Europe are affected.

Second, the "new Ostpolitik" unfortunately has not made peace any safer; yet, the "balance of terror" still grants Europe, too, so much security that NATO, trusting the U.S. deterrence arsenal, can still refrain from counteracting the Soviet deployment around Poland, which is gigantic enough to threaten Western Europe at the same time, with a mobilization which is just as bristling with arms.

What, then, is the upshot? The slogan: About face and back to the fifties on the double? No. Nobody wants that. But it would be wholesome if the government and all Bundestag parties in Bonn would base the oftcited "common platform" on the newly substantiated certainty that the Federal Republic today, just as in 1952 (Soviet note on reunification under the conditons of armed neutrality) or in 1955 (accession to NATO), is facing the fundamental decision: freedom comes before unity. Policy toward the West ranks priority over policy toward the East. Defense capability within the balance of forces ranks above unilateral disarmament.

ARTICLE QUESTIONS ADEQUACY OF NATO RESPONSES

[Adelbert Weinstein article: "Vows Instead of Deeds"]

[Text] Brussels, 14 December--The demonstration of Atlantic consensus is impressive. At its winter meeting, NATO not only talked of the need to act in concert. The alliance has made the concept of supranational unity concrete. The demand of outgoing U.S. Secretary of State Muskie that the consequences of direct intervention be made so plain to the soviets that they will refrain from such intervention has been largely followed by the alliance. A catalogue of Western countermeasures was mapped out. Economic, financial, political sanctions were threatened. Granted, the foreign ministers drew attention to the fact that their governments rather than they themselves must decide on the implementation of such plans. Yet the placative warning signal has been shown: If the Russians attack Poland it will spell the end of detente.

It remains to be seen whether the Soviet Union will heed the signal. Furthermore, the question is also justified as to how long the "spirit of Brussels" will exert influence on Atlantic policies. Experience has shown that time and again the alliance adopts dramatic decisions, to be sure, but unity becomes frayed once the conferences are over. The longer the Kremlin keeps its decision on its strategy in Poland pending, the greater becomes the danger that the Western action will show cracks. The reason is that Europe is militarily weak. It was not just U.S. selfishness that made U.S. Secretary of Defense Brown advise the allies in Brussels that they must live up to their commitment of increasing the national defense budgets by a real 3 percent in view of the situation in Poland. It is true that the United States seeks to distribute the burdens of common defense through greater financial contributions by its partners.

But Washington also intends to broaden the strategic leeway of the alliance through stepped-up armament. But the allies are reluctant to follow. There is still a latent tendency for the Europeans to take NATO as a one-sided U.S. security guarantee. The military part of the winter meeting confirmed that. Not even half the armed forces targets for the current year were attained. The defense budgets were not increased. They decreased. Instead, the partners calculated up all they had done in the past. The Americans were told that old Europe is putting up more conventional troops than its overseas partner.

These are self-serving contentions. What was not said was that apart from the Bundeswehr the quality of the European armies and their equipment are inadequate. The Soviet Union is far superior not only numerically but also with respect to military potential. Therefore, viewed from the European angle, detente policy is a mirror reflecting the power conditions that actually prevail.

Therefore, it may be predicted that an Atlantic strategy operating on the threat to abandon detente if the Red army oppresses Poland militarily will meet with resistance in the parliaments, and that not only on the part of the leftwingers who dislike a change in ostpolitik for ideological reasons. The European partners as a whole are afraid of the military colossus in the East. The groups adapting to the gradation of power are increasing.

Moreover, the European-U.S. relationship is not balanced either. Henry Kissinger has drawn attention again to the fact that the American and the European interests outside of Europe are identical everywhere. The former secretary of state also admitted that the United States, being much too accustomed to give its own strategic leeway for action priority, sometimes has failed to take the national European interests adequately into account in NATO. Tensions should be eliminated in such a way that the United States talks with its partners before taking any action. This is what the Americans have done under Carter. But instead of recognizing this the European governments often lamented the lack of American leadership strength.

The situation of partnership within NATO is described thus by former British Ambassador to Washington Jay: Most Europeans are convinced that the United States itself is mostly interested in Europe's defense and therefore the old continent can regard the presence of U.S. troops as a foregone conclusion. This attitude has led to a European selfcomplacency which is reflected by a reluctance to pay whenever it is necessary to relieve the Americans financially in common defense. Finally, the Europeans are inclined to hold the Americans responsible on principle for tensions between the partners or anywhere else in the world.

These observations by a Britisher who knows Europe and its strongest partner should make people think. Jay's assessment of the situation can hardly be refuted, and therefore such resentments are bound to burden the political climate in the alliance in the event of any new tension. Since any reorientation in politics first bears and element of tension in itself, the suggestion to turn away from detente if Poland were victimized by Russia might bring new internal confusion to NATO despite the resolution adopted unanimously.

Kissinger's warning against NATO's constant readiness to overthrow decisions, to postpone decisions, to retract initiatives should be taken seriously. In any crisis, ranging from Berlin to Prague or Afghanistan, and now Poland, NATO swore to become stronger militarily. It undertook to carry the burden jointly. But for the most part it relapsed in a few weeks into its old habit of leaving it up to the Americans alone to manage the crisis. Kissinger has attributed this chameleon strategy to the fact that Europe cannot act as an entity because it is still searching for its identity. But will what makes sense to historian Kissinger as an explanation be sufficient to the political newcomer in world politics Reagan as an interpretation of the unstable internal Atlantic situation?

The new U.S. Government for the time being is beyond the suspicion of intending to pursue a policy of isolationism. But if the Europeans deal with it with the same prejudice and with the same misinterpretations as they did with the Carter administration, we may see happening what Senator Mansfield always demanded: A reduction of the U.S. military engagement in Europe. This could be termed a "national reconsideration" on the part of the United States and a reaction to a growing nationalism of the Europeans; a nationalism which, besides, begins to assume a special form on the old continent; the Europeans excessively pursue the enhancement of the welfare state. In this regard they spare neither costs nor economic risks. Defense, however, they want to leave to the Americans. This just cannot work in the long run. This is why Poland is not only a burden but also an opportunity for the alliance. Maybe the reconsideration will take longer this time.

FRENCH FIRM LANDS 'BIGGEST' WESTERN DEAL WITH USSR

LD161615 Paris FRANCE-SOIR in French 14-15 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] The biggest contract ever concluded between the Soviets and a Western firm has just been signed by Rhone-Poulenc and the USSR's deputy minister of foreign trade.

The French firm will supply large amounts of agrochemical products and fertilizers intended for Russian agriculture. The agreement also envisages the construction of seven chemical factories for the Soviet Union, three of which will be fertilizer factories. The total value of the contract over a 10-year period is Fr30 billion.

The agreement was signed on the occasion of the first day of the meeting of the Franco-Soviet Grand Commission in Paris. On the eve of the signing of the agreement, which was negotiated in the utmost secrecy, Rhone-Poulenc stock rose 4.2 percent on the Paris stock market. Certain "operators" were well informed....

BARRE REAFFIRMS CONTINUED SUPPORT FOR QUEBEC

[Text] The Quebec Prime Minister Rene Levesque will be returning home tomorrow following his visit to France. Today Premier Barre and Levesque signed agreements on technological and industrial cooperation between Paris and Quebec. On the diplomatic level, France will continue to support its Canadian cousin, as it did, for example, in refusing to take part in the Dakar Francophone conference because Quebec had not been accepted there. Mr Barre was very firm about this when speaking to (Bertrand Vannier):

[Begin recording] As for the Dakar Francophone conference for us it was not a matter of interfering in the internal affairs of Canada, and in relations between the Canadian Federal Government and the government of Quebec. Our principle is that of nonintervention, and we respect it. On the Francophone conference, we simply said: It would not be possible for France to take part in it if Quebec did not take part in it under the conditions which Quebec deemed acceptable. Such is our position, and I see no reason to change it. [end recording]

MARCHAIS REFUSES TO ENDORCE PCI STANCE ON POLAND

[Text] During Radio Luxembourg's "Impromptu News Program" on 13 December PCF Secretary General Georges Marchais adopted a stance on the PCI's comments on the situation in Poland (it should be recalled that the PCI has not only condemned the principle of an armed intervention but has also stated that "The mere fact of putting forward the hypothesis of an intervention constitutes an unacceptable limitation of sovereignty—LE MONDE editor's note). "We are being criticized for not adopting the same stance as our Italian comrades. Well, I will be frank with you: it is entirely out of the question for us to do that because, being jealous of our independence, we do not intend to align with any party. Not with the PCI or with any other party, including the CPSU....

"In acting as they have done—since you ask me the question—our Italian comrades are not taking Poland's real interests into account. Allow me to explain: they are in fact helping to make people believe that an outside threat is hanging over Poland. In doing that, in my view, they are not facilitating our Polish comrades' task. Quite the reverse: they are complicating it and making it more difficult to implement what I would describe as the necessary process of democratic and socialist reform decided on by the Polish United Workers Party and the Polish Government in order to solve their problems and make progress....

"Taking part in the alarmist campaign of deception about the alleged threat of Soviet intervention is--whether you like it or not--both encouraging dogmatism and resistance to socialist reform and also encouraging those who do not want socialism to be strengthened in Poland.

"How can anybody fail to see that such a campaign helps the plans of all those who want to revive the dangerous and ruinous arms race, to try to scuttle international detente and to align the European capitalist countries even more closely with Washington?"

Radio Luxembourg: So much for the Italians.

Georges Marchais: So much for all sides! So much for everybody! I can tell you quite calmly that the PCF does not accept and would not accept that any party whatsoever should tell it what it must do to serve the interests of our people and our country which we love.

I will add something else: It is absolutely out of the question that we should discuss or publish communiques with any party on the situation in Poland.

L'HUMANITE ON PCF STANCE ON POLAND,'ALARMIST LIES'

LD161117 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 12 Dec 80 p 8

[Text] The PCI leadership has just expressed "the Italian Communists' concern over the situation in Poland" and "the dangers posed by foreign interference and the very serious consequences which a military intervention in that country would have."

Let us recall, if there is any need to do so, that for its part the PCF has adopted a clear stance since the beginning of events in Poland. It was expressed by Georges Marchais in the first speech he made on his return--at the beginning of September--from opening the international stand at the L'HUMANITE Festival. He stated: "It is up to the Polish people, their government and the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] and them alone to carry out the reforms which have been announced and which will- we are convinced of this--make it possible to overcome the difficulties and help strengt socialist Poland. We are confident and wish the PZPR complete success in this task."

The PCF has always abided by and continues to abide by that stance, which it has explained directly during various meetings with fraternal communist parties.

At the same time the PCF strongly rejects the alarmist campaign of lies being mounted by all socialism's adversaries over the "threat of a Soviet intervention in Poland." This campaign, which is likely to curb the reform process, is being denounced by the PZPR, the trade unions, including Solidarity, and the Polish bishops. It is being used to justify the arrival of new U.S. military equipment in the FRG, to demand the European governments' unconditional alignment with Washington and to secure, at any price, increases in military spending which already constitutes an intolerable burden on the workers.

The PCF, faithful to the principles of the independence and sovereignty of states and peoples, of noninterference in their affairs, strongly opposes this harmful policy. It is actively militating for France's security and independence, for disarmament, for the simultaneous dissolution of the military blocs and for international cooperation based on mutual interest.

PSI'S CRAXI COMMENTS ON POLISH SITUATION

[PSI Secretary Bettino Craxi editorial: "Lord Deliver Us From Brothers"]

[Text] Poland has good reason to beware of brothers willing to straighten its back by dint of beatings. For the time being the "brothers" have decided to wait. They have limited themselves to lovingly surrounding Poland with a cordon sanitaire composed of tanks and mobilized armies which scrutinize from the hilltops the preparations on the plains.

Even the Polish brothers, the ruling Communist Party, which has after all given some demonstrations of wisdom and moderation by accepting the positive outcome toward which the serious crisis of the summer was moving, failed to provide a good example of pride, strength and patriotism when, via its most "orthodox" representatives it echoed the threats of a benign invasion.

Everyone regards the situation as explosive and great alarm has spread everywhere in the past few days. Indeed, the threat of a military invasion of Poland still exists. None of those concerned denied it convincingly and nobody rules it out completely from the list of possible hypotheses, though referring to it as an extreme measure--but one stemming from an iron logic. The great concern evident on so many widely differing sides, including Romania and Yugoslavia, is anything but unfounded. It can only be tempered by a realistic analysis of the facts. A threat is one thing, however, serious and intolerable--at least for those like us who consider the principle of the peoples' independence and the states' sovereignty fundamental--but its actual implementation is another matter. The Soviet Government should be the first to know what a major risk there is of a Warsaw Pact military intervention turning into an adventure with unpredictable costs. It would be an adventure on Polish territory, the home of a nation and a people who already ill endure the state of construction in which they find themselves. It would be an adventure in the context of international relations, which would suffer an upheaval much more disruptive and damaging from all viewpoints and for everyone than the one which occurred following the Afghan invasion, whose effects barely reached directly from a peripheral Asian area to the political heart of Europe and the world.

An analysis of domestic events encourages a belief in the enduring possibility of a settlement of the shifting balances on the basis of a new level of evolution established by the extraordinary success of a free trade union movement--and without traumatic ruptures, albeit in the presence of spreading disputes, on which Solidarity is rightly trying to impose a rule of responsibility and discipline, discouraging excessive haste and pursuing instead an objective of consolidation, preceded by the Catholic Church's mediating role. The most insidious area, however, remains the economic crisis and its dangerous social effects. Visitors to Warsaw bring back serious and consistent reports about the widespread state of dissatisfaction, serious shortages of foodstuffs, growing financial and production difficulties and erosion of leadership individuals and apparatus.

The regime is striving to correct the most serious errors and to organize the upteenth attempt to get out of the crisis, but this will require a long time yet, and also a framework of active understanding and international assistance, which are absolutely essential for tackling an emergency which has become very acute.

Poland--placed under strict observation, surrounded by the mistrust of the "family" which seems to see phantoms and conspiracies everywhere, hindered in its movements toward an opening-up and a necessary internal liberalization--is in danger of dying from suffocation.

Poland needs the USSR and the Eastern bloc, to which it is bound by a system of politico-military alliances which nobody has challenged or wants to challenge, but it also, and especially needs Western and Eastern Europe, to which it must sell and from which it must buy and from which it can secure loans and must secure respite for payment of debts already incurred.

The brothers' excessive partisan love is therefore in danger of leading to disaster. This is what must be prevented by means of strong political pressure from everyone, from states and parties with a chance of a hearing in the "palaces" of "real socialism" or in the palace where the decisions are taken, stating clearly right now what they might or might not do tomorrow in response to an act of violence and tyranny toward the Polish nation. You can only smile sadly when even in our country you hear the word "socialism" used amid events evocative of the European scenario of the big empires of the last century and early part of this century.

VATICAN SPOKESMAN DENIES ZAGLADIN RECEIVED

[Text] Vatican 16 Dec (ANSA)--Vatican spokesman Romeo Panciroli today denied a newspaper report that Vadim Zagladin (an official from the Soviet Communist Party's foreign section) had been received in the Vatican. Panciroli declined to answer a newsman who asked if the Soviet party official had had contacts with representative of the Holy See outside of the Vatican when he was in Rome Tuesday, December 9. Panciroli said that the head of the Kremlin's Department for Affairs with Italy, France, Greece, and Turkey, a certain Mr Adamishin, had been received on September 4 by Vatican Secretary of State Cardinal Agostino Casaroli. Asked if Poland had cropped up in the discussions, Panciroli said "I have nothing further to say".

POPE SENDS TELEGRAMS TO BISHOPS OF GDANSK, SZCZECIN

[Text] Vatican, 16 Dec (ANSA)--Pope John Paul Two sent two identical telgrams today to the bishop of Gdansk, Lech Kaczmarek, and the bishop of Szczecin, Casimir Majdanski, to say that his thoughts were with the people during today's special ceremonies in those two cities. A monument is being inaugurated in Gdansk and a special ceremony is being held in Szczecin for victims of the repression ten years ago.

The pope in his messages recalled the "tragic events" of 1970 and appealed to divine mercy for those who lost their lives. The ceremonies in the two cities served to revive the memory of those who died and to encourage the living, the papal message said. The pope voiced thanks to God that events this year went differently and asked that God give his compatriots the force necessary to work for the common good in peace and mutual respect for one another. The pope's message ended with a benediction for those participating in the ceremonies and for all Poles.

I AVYI SUMMARIZES CCP-KKE-INTERIOR POSITIONS

[Exclusive I AVYI report from Beijing on recent KKE-Interior-CCP summit talks quotes positions of CCP and the KKE-Interior.]

[Text] "If there is a Soviet military intervention in Poland, it would create a crisis within the leadership of the Soviet Communist Party," stated Hu Yaobang, general secretary of the CCP Central Committee in addressing the KKE-Interior delegation during the recent summit talks between the two parties. Hu Yaobang underlined that no socialist country has a right to intervene in the internal affairs of another country and that in the end if the Soviet Union does intervene in Poland this would create reaction not only from many countries but also from the peoples of East Europe.

The relevant I AVYI report from Beijing is as follows: Beijing, 15 (Special report) The two summit meetings between the delegation of the Central Committee of the KKE-Interior, headed by Comrade Bambis Dhrakopoulos, the first with Li Xiannian, vice-chairman of the Central Committee of the CCP and the second with Hu Yaobang, general secretary of the Central Committee of the CCP closed the talks between the two communist parties on Sunday in Beijing. Both sides expressed satisfaction over restoration of comradely and brotherly relations.

On the Chinese side the two meetings were attended by members of the Central Committee and the section on international relations of the CCP. On Sunday night the general secretary of the CCP gave an official dinner in honor of the Greek delegation on occasion of the conclusion of talks and its 15-day visit to China.

A short time earlier, Hu Yaobang gave an exclusive interview to I AVYI. (Editor's note: We will publish the full text of the interview in a later edition.) The final phase of the talks, always held in a cordial and friendly atmosphere, covered bipartite party issues, the problems of the two countries, progress of international developments and questions of the international communist and worker's movement.

The Greek delegation, which is made up of comrades: B. Dhrakopoulos, secretary of the Central Committee; G. Banias, member of the Executive Bureau; B. Konstandinidhis and T. Trikas, both members of the Central Committee and M. Anagnostakis, member of the cultural committee of the Central Committee, are due to leave Beijing this afternoon and are due in Athens early tomorrow.

The Positions of the Two Sides

The basic positions as explained by the delegations of the two parties during the talks, could be summarized as follows:

The Chinese Positions

1. Satisfaction over restoration of relations between the two parties. "We are particularly happy over the visit of the KKE-Interior delegation to China," stressed Vice Chairman Li Xiannian, "as well as with the restoration of relations between the two parties on the basis of the principles of independence and autonomy, of mutual respect, nonintervention and equality."

The same feelings were also expressed by Hu Yaobang. "The restoration of relations," he said, "will be useful to both parties as well as to our two countries. He then underlined the importance, to the international communist movement, of the visits to China by the Italian Communist Party delegation under Berlinguer in April; the Spanish Communist party delegation under Carillo in November and the KKE-Interior delegation under Dhrakopoulos in December.

]. Condemnation of Interventions. Li Xiannian and Hu Yaobang dealt at length with the question of intervention by one communist party in the internal affairs of another communist party and on the question of hegemonism.

"A socialist party does not have the right to intervene in the internal affairs of another country. At the same time, the communist party which fails to oppose such an intervention will most certainly lose the confidence of the workers and the people of its country," stressed Hu Yaobang who at the same time stressed the necessity of opposing Soviet hegemonism. On his part, Li Xiannian stressed that if ever China developed hegemonistic trends then it must be condemned by the other parties and the other countries. "Our generation," he added, "leaves this legacy to coming generations."

3. Reevaluation of the progress of the Chinese party. The representatives of the CCP noted that today there is an attempt for a more general re-evaluation of their party's progress over the last 30 years, of successes but also of mistakes committed during the period of President Mao's leadership. "There was," they stressed, "an overestimation of the intensity of class struggle in a socialist country like China which was emerging from centuries of feudalism. This fact led to mistakes of a leftist and superobjective character. The mistakes were more numerous during the decade of the so-called Cultural Revolution. This was a period of disaster and backsliding for the political, economic, cultural and social life of the country."

4. Reconstruction and reorganization. The present phase was described by the representatives of the CPC as a period of reconstruction and reorganization in all sectors.

"It is necessary to strengthen the legal system, to strengthen the legal status of socialism," said Li Xiannian who continued, "Anarchy must be dealt with, there must be democracy, the view of the workers must be sought on questions which affect them. In this direction there must be a separation of the responsibilities of the state and of the party. A strict concentrationalist planning is not the best way to direct the economy of a country as large as China. What is needed is decentralization from the center and in the direction of the regions, toward the city and toward the business."

5. International problems. Referring particularly to the adverse effects of hegemonism, the Chinese leaders expressed concern over international developments.

Speaking on the Polish situation, the general secretary of the CCP said, "We have no accurate information on the situation in Poland. In my opinion, if there is a Soviet military intervention this would create a crisis within the leadership of the Soviet Communist Party. There will be reaction not only from many countries but also from the peoples of East Europe. The communists of the whole world must oppose any such intervention."

6. Relations between China and Greece. Comrades Hu Yaobang and Li Xiannian particularly discussed the contribution of Greece and China to world civilization. They referred to the resistence of the Greek people during the Nazi occupation and stressed the importance which is inherent in the development of relations between China and Greece. They appreciated the visit of the KKE-Interior delegation as an event which will have positive repercussions upon the development of relations not only between the two parties but also of the relations between the two countries.

The Positions of the KKE-Interior

During the two summit meetings the Greek delegation of the KKE-Interior stressed the following points:

1. B. Dhrakopoulos underlined that for the KKE-Interior this restoration of friendly relations with the CCP must be considered an extremely important event. "Development of relations between the KKE-Interior and the CCP will be to the benefit of both parties and of both countries as well as to the benefit of the international communist and workers movement," he said.

2. The principles of independence--autonomy, mutual respect and equality and of non-intervention are a firm basis for the development of relations. At the same time, the experience of the two parties from the struggle against dogmatism, the rejection of the view of the party as leader and as the exclusive example together with insistence upon implementation of creative Marxism based upon the conditions of each country, establish the best conditions for the cooperation of the two parties.

"If these conditions," stressed the Greek delegation, "were respected within the framework of international communism and the worker's movement, the situation in the world today and within the international movement would have been very different." The KKE-Interior delegation also stressed the negative effects of hegemonism over the area of the international workers movement and the socialist countries and added, "it is imperative today to intensify the struggle against imperialism, for the defense of international detente and peace, for a joint struggle of the anti-imperialist, democratic and workers forces. This, however, presupposes opposition to every form of hegemonism no matter where it originates."

3. The coincidence of views on many basic points was described by the Greek delegation as a fact which permits the relations between the two parties to have a fundamental and not just a formal character, permits them to express their difference freely wherever they may exist, without this becoming an obstacle to the development of their relations.

4. Comrade B. Dhrakopoulos referred to the tortuous course of the KKE-Interior which was born out of the struggle against dogmatism and against intervention in the internal affairs of the Greek Communist movement. He also referred to the opening of a peaceful way toward socialism on the basis of our country's realities, of a socialism with democracy and freedom.

5. The Greek party delegation, in conclusion, explained the dangers created in our country by Turkish chauvinism and the support it receives from the United States and NATO. It also referred to the Cyprus issue and the need for active support to the struggle of the Cypriot people.

Some 600 DISK and affiliated officers already under detention include DISK Chairman Abbullah Basturk and members of the Executive Committee.

FOREIGN MINISTERS APPROVE FOOD AID FOR POLAND

LD161432 London PRESS ASSOCIATION in English 1339 GMT 16 Dec 80

[By Don Philpott, LPA agricultural correspondent in Brussels]

[Text] Britain's farmers should benefit from a deal agreed in Brussels today when Europe's foreign ministers approved a massive food aid programme, subsidised by Common Market taxpayers and cheap loans.

The EEC meeting in Brussels confirmed that decision of the European Commission to sell more than 400,000 tonnes of food to Poland worth billions of pounds. Britain, which had a record cereal harvest this year, is expected to supply a major part of the 100,000 tonnes of barley asked for by the Poles in their worldwide appeal for food sent out earlier this year.

The UK has already shipped more than 40,000 tonnes of barley to Poland this year, but further trade was halted when export credit to guarantee payment could not be found. As part of today's deal, member governments will undertake to guarantee loans at low interest rates so that Poland can buy the food it needs.

The ministers, including Lord Carrington's deputy at the foreign office, Sir Ian Gilmour, also agreed the food would be sold at prices up to 15 percent lower than on the world market--the 20million pounds being met from Brussels funds. The deal today allows Poland to buy 50,000 tonnes of sugar, 30,000 tonnes of butter, 50,000 tonnes of beef and pork, 3,000 tonnes of milk powder, 40,000 tonnes of oil rape seed, 200,000 tonnes of barley and rye, and 25,000 tonnes of EEC-grown rice.

ROMANIA PROPOSES NONAGGRESSION PACT AT CSCE

LD161638 Madrid in Spanish to Europe 1400 GMT 16 Dec 80

[Text] The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe is in the last week of its first part. Here is a report from Jose Marvel Salgado at the Palace of Congresses, the conference venue:

An interesting point this morning was a Romanian proposal for a treaty to be signed by the 35 participating countries undertaking in each case to use neither force nor threats against any of the rest. Some people have seen in this proposal an allusion to the situation on the border between Poland and the Soviet Union. This proposal will be officially submitted at tomorrow's plenary session.

In the committee dealing with the followup to the conference, Romania has proposed Bucharest as a venue for the next conference.

The economic commission has been dealing with transport matters, and in the commission on security a number of speeches have been made in support of proposals for a disarmament conference. Among them, the Soviet Delegate General Mikhaylov made a long speech in favor of the Polish proposal for a conference on military detente and disarmament, insisting that this be held within the framework of the general CSCE conference. He also said that the other proposals from France, Yugoslavia and so forth are worth considering and not contradictory. In short, a speech which was on the optimistic side though without offering or affirming anything specific.

GENSCHER RECEIVES SOVIET AMBASSADOR IN BONN

[Text] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA)--For the second time within 2 weeks, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher today received the Soviet ambassador to Bonn, Vladimir Semenovich Semenov. The discussion possibly concerned Genscher's wish to meet his opposite number Andrey Gromyko in Moscow next spring.

Bonn attributes great importance to a continuation of the West-East exchange of views in crisis situations. In this respect diplomatic circles stressed that the German ambassador in Moscow, Andreas Meyer-Landrut, is currently maintaining intensive diplomatic contacts. Genscher travels to Prague tomorrow for a 3-day visit--the first high-level East-West contact since the aggravation of the Polish crisis.

Further Details

[Text] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA)--According to the Bonn Foreign Ministry East-West relations, the international situation and bilateral questions were the topics which Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher discussed in a 2 and 1/2-hour talk today with Soviet Ambassador Vladimir Semenovich Semenov. One of the topics was a possible visit by Genscher to Moscow. Soviet Foreign Minister Andrey Gromyko had invited him some time ago. The date is to be arranged in further talks with the Soviet Union and, in the view of observers, could be as early as next spring.

It was Genscher's second talk with the top Soviet diplomat in 10 days. He had received him on Monday last week to expound on the statement issued by the recent EC summit meeting on East-West relations in light of developments in Poland. Tomorrow Genscher will be leaving for Prague for a 3-day talk with Czechoslovakian leaders, the first high-level East-West meeting since the sharpening of the crisis in Poland.

GOVERNMENT, OPPOSITION WELCOME HAIG APPOINTMENT

[Text] Bonn, 17 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Government and the opposition have welcomed the nomination of former NATO Supreme Commander Alexander Haig as secretary of state. Government Spokesman Kurt Becker told the press today that his nomination is seen as the "return of a friend of Europe."

The opposition CDU foreign affairs spokesman, Alois Mertes, said that Haig's appointment is a gleam of light for the Atlantic alliance and for a realistic Eastern policy. Haig has never urged hostility toward Moscow but cautioned against detente and disarmament concepts which tend to lull the political will and a clear view of security policy in Europe and America.

Franz Josef Strauss, Bavarian minister-president and CSU chairman, said in a telegram to Haig that one of the most responsible offices in the free world is now in the hands of an experienced student of the domestic situation in Europe.

DIE WELT Editorial

DW180951 Bonn DIE WELT in German 18 Dec 80 p 6

[Cay Graf Brockdorff editorial: "A Man Familiar With the Situation"]

[Text] "A signal that America is on the move again, that our foreign policy will be clear, stable, and strong and our domestic policy will be marked by commonsense and equality of chances," these words by Reagan also applied to the appointment of new Secretary of Labor Donovan, to be sure, yet primarily they were obviously coined for Alexander Haig, the new U.S. secretary of state--coined for him as a person but perhaps even more so as a symbol of what Reagan visualizes as his future administration.

A signal inward and a signal outward. Some senators have announced already that they will subject Haig to a thorough heari[illegible] Vietnam and Watergate prior to the Senate confirmation of Haig's appointment requ[illegible] under the constitution. It is generally known that Haig cannot be charged with failure or even dishonesty in either field--Watergate prosecutor Jaworski called the man, who in Nixon's last days practically held the administration together, "one of the uncelebrated heroes" of the scandal--though that is not the point. Rather it is the last attempt of the front dating back to the years of America's humiliation to keep the one down "who has something to do with it." It is to Reagan's credit that he has taken up this challenge; and in the interest of an America which does not wish to remain stuck in the swamp and pain of yesterday but wishes to, and must, set out for new shores, it must be expected that he will weather this challenge.

Hence, Vietnam and Watergate will be overcome by Haig. But this is a mere marginal function of the new man. As hardly any other American he embodies the new determination to call Moscow's challenge and to counteract it. With him at the top the United States first of all knows that the direction shown is forward. But what is no less important is the intellectual caliber of the new secretary of state.

The secretaries of state of the United States thus far mostly represented the type of "Washington attorney," the experienced, wise and quite honorable and patriotic lawyer whose strong suit, however, is not the flaming, forensic appearance but rather the settlement attained in the backroom; Vance, Rogers, or former Secretary of Defense Clifford. There is always a certain inclination to making concessions, to the punctual settlement even without any global strategic pattern. In between appears for a change the type of the brilliant professor, the theoretician who sparkingly dives into practical work but nevertheless remains something of an amateur. The huge department in Foggy Bottom, however, and its personnel in all the world, and the world itself, just is not a lawyer's office with a few dozen employees, and much less a seminar.

Haig, now, has experience in leading hundreds of thousands, and above all, in all his life he never worked on mere theory but instead worked hard in practice. He was the young officer who had to report on the situation to the feared and ingenious MacArthur in Korea, prepared to answer every inserted question, and he was the NATO commander in chief--a career based on complete and detailed mastering of the situation, there is no other way of putting it. The Americans experience here that the brilliance and experience they have so much and neglect so much in politics, will be used in a top position--not the brilliance of "whiz kids" and computer brains, knowing all and figuring out everything without understanding it, but a supreme intellectual caliber.

It is a signal to the allies. Haig is not merely a man advocating an intensified and adequate closing of the arms gap, not merely a man who knows what balance is. He is also an expert knowing in detail about the European situation. He is able to tell exactly all who say that gaps in their budgets or overly powerful leftwings justify their claim for the poorhouse, how their situation really is. The time has passed when Bonn looked down in a self-assertive attitude at the embodied insufficiencies in Washington. Hans Apel particularly will have much material to ponder on his loutish appearance in Brussels has left a cool climate behind between him and Haig.

It is a signal to the Third World. The New York TIMES speculated that Haig has only "second hand" knowledge of that field. But that applies much rather to his critics. Haig knows the whole world situation, also south of the equator. One can expect that he will not get stuck in spectacular individual actions such as in the Middle East nor that individual countries will be snubbed like Argentina where nothing was achieved domestic-politically in La Plata, while an alibi was given for additional grain shipments to Moscow. One must assume in this respect that priorities will be set despite the attention given to individual problems. Haig certainly does not consider the Cubans a stabilizing factor in Africa.

Last but not least it is a signal for Moscow this highest priority of world politics. The new secretary of state is not the type that can be worn out and talked into unsatisfactory compromises such as SALT II. There is hardly a better expert on Soviet strength and Soviet mentality.

In other words, Haig is a superior man, and that is what America needs to become a superior force again and carry out its leadership role again. Reagan is facing severe domestic political problems and his ability to master them will bring influence to bear on his mastering worldwide developments. Whatever the future president has ever promised with regard to America's role in heading the liberal cause, has been confirmed by the appointment of Alexander Haig.

CHANCELLOR'S AIDE VIEWS INTER-GERMAN RELATIONS

[Correspondent Limberg interview with Gunter Huonker, minister of state in the chancellor's office in Bonn--live on recorded]

[Text] [Question] In the past few days the Federal Government has found itself exposed to a sort of hot-cold shower treatment of threats and conciliatory hints by GDR politicians. Following the NATO conference at which Western sanctions in the event of a Soviet invasion of Poland had been discussed, Foreign Minister Fischer called the treaties with GDR into question, charging that Bonn plans to proceed from cancellations to a policy of severance that the planned NATO sanctions constitute a monstrous provocation, an impudent imperialist presumption, he reportedly said. Erich Honecker used entirely different tones early this week. He denied any delimitation policy on the part of the GDR. The two German states, he said, bear special responsibility for safeguarding peace and for complementing political detente with military detente. How should Honecker's mollifying words after Fischer's attacks be judged, as mere lip service intended to make delimitation look less severe or should they be taken as a clear signal to the Federal Government?

[Answer] It is true that as far as utterances of leading personages of the GDR in the past few days are concerned, we may indeed refer to them as contradictory. It is true, moreover, that Mr Honecker's speech of 15 December sounded entirely different than the speech by Foreign Minister Fischer. It was with great reserve that we reacted to the speech by Mr Fischer, which was very hard in its choice of vocabulary and which took us somewhat aback, because we feel that we should not allow ourselves to be provoked by such utterances, much less in such a difficult world political situation.

The Federal Government welcomes the fact that the chairman of the GDR Council of State in his speech on principle advocated an improvement in the relations between the two German states. And if Mr Honecker now declares in addition that there is no such thing as a policy aimed at delimitation on the part of the GDR, then I might add that it would be a good thing if the GDR would let these words be followed by deeds. This would mean, for example, that it would be a good thing to remove the obstacle on the road toward cooperation of which Mr Honecker, too, speaks, an obstacle which has been put up in the form of the aggravation of tourist travel by means of the drastic increase in the minimum exchange requirement instituted in early October.

[Question] Do I understand you correctly that you mean to say that the abolition or reduction of the increased mandatory exchange is the precondition for Bonn to enter into talks with the GDR again?

[Answer] What we said was that the increase in the minimum exchange will not be accepted by the Federal Government, that the Federal Government expects, and must demand, a correction. I would not at this point talk about preconditions in the legal sense of the word. The Federal Government has stated repeatedly that it is prepared to talk about the overall interconnection in the relations between the two German states. This overall interconnection also includes the question concerning a correction of the increase in the minimum exchange, of course.

[Question] The GDR is probably most concerned about the disarmament issue. Honecker indicated that a dialogue between the two German states could come about in this matter. Would that be feasible, regardless how the matter with the mandatory exchange quota develops?

[Answer] Well, I believe that in the present most complicated situation it is hardly feasible--I say now, at that time--to pick out an issue of common interest and have arms control negotiations although we are naturally interested in them. I consider it hardly feasible to pick out such an issue in an isolated way. Particularly since one must know that the problem of arms control in the field of medium-range arms--a particularly important field--is not an issue for bilateral talks because it must be negotiated between the Soviet Union and the United States. But if we say that we are prepared to talk on the general structure of relations, it means that there is naturally preparedness on our part to discuss the issues mentioned by Mr Honecker.

[Question] You just stressed it again that the mandatory exchange quota is a most decisive matter for the Federal Government with regard to relations between the two German states. Are there any signs indicating flexibility on the part of the GDR in this matter, or must one much rather assume that the matter is closed now?

[Answer] I do not know of any indications showing the GDR's flexibility in this matter. I would never say in politics that this or that matter has been closed, particularly with regard to the minimum exchange quota, since the GDR knows--it has been told very clearly--that we cannot accept the increase of the minimum exchange quota. In other words: It is clear to the GDR that this must be also discussed.

[Question] But in view of the international situation, the situation in and around Poland, much time will probably elapse before anything can be said about it.

[Answer] I believe that it is the main task at the moment to do everything to avoid that in addition to quarrels on German-German relations there will be additional complications bringing influence to bear on the political climate in Europe. In other words, now one must most of all maintain composure. We keep really very clearly to our predictable political course vis-a-vis the GDR, as the federal chancellor said in his government statement. It is true that it is not very feasible that such a dialogue could get going in a very short time. You mentioned the situation in Poland, but I can just repeat once more: We are prepared to discuss the general structure of relations between the two German states. And in this connection one must naturally also discuss the minimum exchange quota problem.

PAPER NOTES MOSCOW'S RESERVE ON NATO STATEMENT

[Commentary signed EN: "Moscow's Normal Daily Quota"]

[Text] Not everything that sounds martial from Moscow should scare the West. The belated reaction of the Soviet media to the NATO decision should be taken more seriously by the West than the excited response from East Berlin. This response is relevant only to the extent that it makes it clear how swiftly everything can be called into question which was concluded 10 years ago with the expectation that it was weatherproof. If East Berlin fans the fire, Moscow is not pouring oil on it--it does so rather on troubled waters. Accusations that NATO is interfering in Poland and encouraging anti-socialist elements and that it needs an alibi for the arms race are the normal daily quota of Soviet propaganda.

The Kremlin's caution is not solely attributable to the determination in the NATO statement. The determination in NATO's attitude, however, is not enough to justify Moscow's restraint. There are more important motives for it: The Kremlin is aware that it can aggravate tension with each concrete threat but relax the situation with any threat not uttered. It would have to make good the promissary notes which East Berlin seems prepared to issue so diligently In such a situation it is necessary to consider whether the heaviest ordnance ought to be put into position, especially since NATO's warning is tied to a specific situation which is solely up to the power and responsibility of the Soviet Union to create or avoid.

Another reason for Moscow's restraint is that the Kremlin leadership is not planning a military intervention in Poland, despite all appearances. Its military concentration along the southern, eastern and western borders of Poland is menacing. Presumably it will not have to be set marching. It is the possibility of an invasion alone which determines the Polish awareness. The threat makes the misdeed unnecessary. Thus, the NATO statement is probably correctly understood in the Kremlin. It is threatening steps which presumably it will not have to take.

The company announced today that a contract to supply 1,500 twin-axle dump trucks in 1981 worth DM200 million has been signed. All the vehicles are intended for civilian use.

CPSU'S PONOMAREV: NO SOVIET INTERVENTION IN POLAND

LD172626 Paris Domestic Service in French 1600 GMT 17 Dec 80

[Summary] Yesterday's Gdansk ceremony brought together officials of the government, church and independent trade unions in a form of national reconciliation.

"It is in this somewhat euphoric climate that a Soviet official has just stated the Red Army will not intervene in Poland. The secretary general of the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee is at present in Paris at the head of a Parliamentary delegation. Boris Ponomarev considers that the Poles have enough inner strength to settle their affairs among themselves, and that above all there is no question of the USSR intervening in the matter."

LE MONDE ON NATO DILEMMA OVER RESPONSE TO POLAND

[Editorial: "NATO and Poland"]

[Text] Faced with the threat of aggression should we quickly issue loud warnings or, on the other hand, keep quiet so as not to "offer any pretext" for the adventure? Who is right—the Americans, who were the first to sound the alarm about the Soviet buildup around Poland, or Mr Trudeau, who thinks that too many speculations are "inappropriate for the cause of peace?"

The quarrel would be legitimate and still undecided if discretion had not already been extensively used in the past, each time with negative results: neither in Czechoslovakia in 1968 when Presidents Johnson and de Gaulle had, each for his own reasons, decided to show the greatest restraint, nor in Afghanistan, where U.S. warnings came too late to spark off an orchestrated campaign, did the West succeed in preventing the Russian tanks from being set in motion.

The lesson has been learned as far as Poland is concerned. By systematically denouncing all the Red Army's preparations, and basing their statements on the great credibility which their means of detection and observation give them, the U.S. leaders were aiming at two goals: Stripping the Soviet high command of the surprise effect to which it is so attached in all its military operations, but also, and above all, clearly warning Moscow's political leadership of the risks to which a decision on direct intervention would expose it.

The NATO session which has just ended has confirmed that the latter result has largely been achieved. The communiue published in Brussels Friday is the roughest seen in Western cricles recently, and on this occasion the alliance has shown a cohesion which it did not show in the Afghanistan affair, even after the invasion.

However, the Western governments have rightly refrained from listing the sanctions envisaged, and that has also enabled them to conceal their differences of opinion. The list which Mr Muskie had brought from Washington was not revealed but it does seem that the secretary of state, while advocating a halt in all diplomatic negotiations between East and West, refrained from including the SALT talks—a matter to which even Mr Reagan attaches too much importance to shelve it once and for all. On the other hand the list apparently included a halt to trade relations between the two German states, or at least suspending the advantages which the GDR obtains from its virtual membership of the EEC. That is out of the question, the Bonn leaders immediately replied, since their Constitution and their interest, oblige them not to regard the other Germany as a "foreign" country.

Despite these appeasements East Berlin immediately started a "trial of strength" with Bonn by threatening to repudiate the inter-German agreements signed at the beginning of the seventies in the event of Western sanctions. West German Foreign Minister Genscher forestalled this action by insisting that the NATO communique include a reference to the need to preserve the "calm situation prevailing in Berlin and the surrounding area." It will take more than that to deter the communist camp from attacking the weak point formed in the "steadfastness front" by a West Germany too well established in detente and its benefits to abandon it readily.

LE FIGARO POLL: GISCARD-MITTERRAND GAP NARROWING

LD181009 Paris LE FIGARO in French 15 Dec 80 pp 1-2

[Charles Rebois report: "A President For 5 Years"]

[Text] The third FIGARO-SOFRES inquiry into the French people's voting intentions in the April-May 1981 presidential election has already made it possible to acquire a better idea about the way votes are really to be cast. Gradually, percentages obtained by the two candidates who are likely, as far as it can be foreseen, to particpate in the second ballot, tend to narrow.

It appears that Valery Giscard d'Estaing would obtain 56 percent and Francois Mitterrand 44 percent. This means that even though the outgoing president has lost three points which his rival has gained, he still has a wide margin. This margin could shrink in view of the traditional distribution of political forces without, however, seriously jeopardizing Valery Giscard d'Estaing's chances.

This information has to be considered in the light of recent changes in the political and economic circumstances.

First, the political situation. It appears that whenever the question directly related to the presidential election, the majority's poor results in recent parliamentary by-elections did not appreciably affect the issue. As far as public opinion is concerned, these are two different problems: a setback suffered by the UDF, an organization which identifies itself with the president, does not prejudge the results of the 26 April and 10 May ballots.

Second, the economy. The austerity measures imposed by the world crisis have not excessively affected Valery Giscard d'Estaing's position. At the very most, it can be thought that the frank description of the economic situation by the prime minister has so far had only limited consequences. The final developments of the campaign will enable us to better assess the impact of this behavior.

However, before pursuing in detail the purely electoral analysis of this inquiry, it is necessary to keep in mind two fundamental pieces of information supplied by answers to questions which did not figure in our initial public opinion polls. It should be understood that, irrespective of what party they belong to, the great majority (81 percent on average) of the French people are in favor of presidential elections by universal suffrage. Even though this was known already, it had to be made clear for the benefit of Francois Mitterrand and Pierre Audreau. However, these same French people (63 against 29 percent) would like to see the presidential term of office limited to 5 years. This is an important item of information.

Georges Pompidou had been concerned by the question of the Septennate. He took steps to correct this peculiarity of our Constitution but failed to carry his task through. Valery Giscard d'Estaing also expressed his support for the idea but has since, in fact, changed his attitude believing that the country should be spared excessively long election periods. And, finally, the guardians of Gaullism naturally defend the cornerstone of a very Guallist Constitution with which, in the final analysis, General de Gaulle's successors easily came to terms.

Nonetheless the question cannot be evaded. It supplies Francois Mitterrand with one of the main arguments for his campaign. Since his ambitions have long been thwarted, the Socialist leader is naturally inclined to add up the duration of the two terms of office which Valery Giscard d'Estaing could well fill and conclude from this that the French people would elect an "uncrowned king." Even though questionable, at least by the terms of the Constitution, this argument has evoked a certain response in countries like the United States which are subjected to presidential elections every 4 years.

In short, a majority of the French people would reelect Valery Giscard d'Estaing but [only] for a 5-year term of office.

As for intentions concerning the second ballot, just as in the previous month, the public opinion poll lists three hypotheses:

First, it is assumed that Jacques Chirac, Michel Debre and Marie-France Garaud would participate in the elections. Together, they would obtain 19.5 percent of votes and Valery Giscard d'Estaing 35 percent. If Jacques Chirac were the only Gaullist candidate, he would obtain 14 percent of votes. He has dropped one point compared with the October poll and gained one compared with the November poll. On this second assumption, Valery Giscard d'Estaing would improve his score (37 percent). According to the three polls carried out since October, the joint scores of the president and the RPR leader represent 51 percent of votes. Any gains or losses on the part of one of them would be made in favor of, or at the expense of, the other. And, third, assuming that Michel Debre is to be the only Gaullist in the race, his score would remain unchanged with 11 percent whereas Valery Giscard d'Estaing would increase his to 39 percent. This means that the outgoing president's score can either increase or decrease 4 percent depending on what hypothesis is envisaged and the assumption that three well-known Gaullists would be candidates is favorable to him to say the least.

On the left, scores are subject to only small fluctuations. It appears, however, that public opinion is beginning to forgive Francois Mitterrand Michel Rocard's elimination. The Socialist Party first secretary's score is showing a slight improvement, but it remains much below the results he achieved in the first ballot of 1974. On the other hand, Valery Giscard d'Estaing's prospects are much better than they were then.

However, with more than 4 months to go before the election takes place, these indications remain precarious. Gaps will probably narrow considerably. It will be noted, however, that in view of these figures, neither Francois Mitterrand, nor Georges Marchais can claim any advantage on the great controversy which is taking place between them. With 17 percent of intended votes in his favor, the PCF secretary general is marking time at a relatively low level whereas the Socialist Party is unable to repeat the success it achieved at the time of parliamentary byelections.

Another fact, erosion of the ecologists' scores since only 3-4 percent of voters intend to vote for them. Furthermore the chances of independent candidates remain very small.

Of course these indications should be used with caution. After giving rise to unusually early excitement, the precampaign period now seems to be in the doldrums. The main candidates who have declared that they will run are making foreign trips so as not to exhaust their ammunition too quickly. Public opinion itself is only showing moderate interest in the initial ups and downs of the election campaign. Moreover 36 percent of the people questioned say they might still change their minds between now and 26 April. In October and November there were only 34 percent who were undecided. There is a particularly large number of undecided people among the Socialists who do not yet seem to have rallied round Francois Mitterrand as candidate.

It should also be noted that French people, whatever their political allegiance, are still forecasting Valery Giscard d'Estaing's victory. However the gap between him and the Socialist candidate has been reduced according to the opinions people expressed. It has narrowed from 13 points in November to 9 points in December.

According to the answers people gave, if the choice is not limited to just two candidates in the second round, Valery Giscard d'Estaing has almost as much support in the RPR as Jacques Chirac. On the other hand no UDF vote will go the Paris mayor. Similarly, on the left, while 14 percent of Communists want Francois Mitterrand to be elected, only 1 percent of Socialist want Georges Marchais to be elected. The splits which determined the stances taken during the last presidential election are, therefore a thing of the past. The election in April and May will be held on a completely new political scene. Its outcome could, therefore, be surprising.

That leaves the question on the scope of the president's powers. Thirty-one percent of the people think they should be reduced. Eleven percent think they should be increased but the majority (51 percent) think they should stay the same. These answers shed light on the debate opened by Francois Mitterrand on the subject of elective monarchy. There are grounds for comparing these with the French people's opinion on the length of the term of office. The government is not abusing its prerogatives, according to the opinion poll but the mandate it receives from universal suffrage should be shorter.

That is probably the main lesson to be learned from our survey.

LE MONDE ON FRENCH TRADE DEFICIT WITH USSR

LD171301 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Dec 80 p 41

[Daniel Vernet dispatch: "For the First Time in 10 Years France Recorded a Trade Deficit Toward the USSR in 1980"]

[Text] Moscow--The fears which French officials have frequently expressed to their Soviet interlocutors are well-founded: the drop in industrial contracts signed in the past 3 years has caused a serious Franco-Soviet trade imbalance. For the first time in 10 years a deficit has appeared this year in the trade balance between the two countries to France's detriment.

Total trade in the first 9 months of this years increased 60.5 percent compared with the corresponding period in 1979; however French imports increased 101.7 percent and exports by 27.2 percent. France's balance of trade deficit amounts to more than Fr2 billion and will probably reach Fr4 billion by the end of the year. If account is taken of a slight trade surplus for services the overall current balance of payments deficit between the USSR and France will be around Fr3 billion.

The balance recorded in 1979 was largely artificial in that French purchases of Soviet gas were accounted as imports from the Netherlands because they passed through that country. This year the anomaly has been corrected. Nonetheless, the deficit is not purely an accounting matter. It is caused by a large increase in the price of energy product supplies by the USSR, for virtually the same quantities as before as far as oil is concerned (6 million tons) and for a twofold increase in purchases of natural gas (4 billion cubic meters as against only 2 billion in 1979); 80 percent of French imports from the USSR consist of primary products.

In the other direction, sales of capital goods have fallen following the fall in contracts signed in 1977, 1978 and 1979. This reduction has been only partly compensated by an increase in sales of chemical products and above all agricultural products (French exports in this sphere have been increased threefold this year.)

The Grand Commission which meets in Paris on 11 and 12 December has tried to remedy this deficit. The task will not be easy because the sale of agricultural products is meeting with reservations from France's European partners and, as far as capital goods are concerned, competition is strong. In addition, as far as imports are concerned, the major plans for purchasing natural gas at prices which the Soviets want eventually to align with oil prices, will widen the gap as from 1986.

The contracts portfolio has, however, improved, reaching Fr4.5 billion between January and November. A further Fr1 billion-worth could be signed before the end of the year (a fluorite [sel fluore] factory, a petroleum coke calcination unit, an electrical insulation varnish unit, treatment of orenburg acid gases), and in that case the total would be more than Fr5 billion, less than in 1987 (Fr6.5 billion), especially if inflation is taken into account, but more than grants [dons] from other Western countries and better than the average over the past 3 years (Fr2.3 billion). For the whole of the 10th 5-year period (1976-1980) French business in the USSR amounts to Fr18.5 billion.

The Contract with Creusot-Loire

The drop in Soviet purchases from abroad from 1977- [figure obscured] was in keeping with a desire to limit trade with capitalist countries in favor of CEMA to reduce currency debts and complete the vast projects contracted during the previous years (in the chemical industry alone, some 100 factories purchased from the West are apparently still "in the pipeline"). This year, however, France has benefitted both from its political attitude in the Afghan affair and from the U.S. embargo although French companies have not, strictly speaking, replaced U.S. firms, despite the arguments about the contract for the silicon plate factory which Creusot-Loire won after the Americans backed out.

The contract was signed despite discreet opposition from the Foreign Ministry. However, the French company could argue that it had been negotiating for this contract for several years and that, in the deal reached, it is not supplying the process (which was to be supplied by the U.S. ARMCO firm) but only the equipment.

The Soviets' decision to use their own technology in the case of an aluminum complex seems to be the result of a deliberate policy attributable to the growing influence of technical ministries compared with the foreign trade ministries. They seem to prefer to increase domestic surplus value without regard for the time taken to carry out the projects rather than making rapid progress by systematically calling on the West.

During the Grand Commission meeting a document will be signed on the application in stages, each of several years, of the long-term program for developing economic and technical cooperation (1980-1990) and above all its annexes which list the major sectors for cooperation. This program was signed in April 1979 by Mr Brezhnev and Mr Giscard d'Estaing during the French president's visit to Moscow. The aim of the program is, in fact, to define the sectors in which French enterprises could have priority over their Western competitors.

Two very important projects now being discussed--the exploitation and supply of natural gas on the Yamal Peninsula at the mouth of the Ob and the modernization of the Moskvich automobile factories which might go to Citroen--would provide an opportunity for large capital equipment deliveries. The first project represents an investment of between Fr45 billion and Fr60 billion (of which around one fourth would go to France) and the second, Fr10 billion; however they will not solve the trade deficit problem. Indeed from the time the gas starts to flow--in 1986 if the project is carried out--French imports from the USSR will surge forward again: 18 to 20 billion cubic meters per year. However, the USSR's overall debt to France is around Fr 4 billion which, in view of Soviet resources, is by no means disturbing.

FOREIGN MINISTER COLOMBO MEETS LIBYAN OFFICIAL

[Text] Rome, 17 Dec (ANSA)--Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and the chief of the Libyan Foreign Liaison Bureau Ahmad ash-Shahati met here Tuesday evening for what reliable sources said later was a frank exchange of views on economic and political problems between the two countries.

Italy and the Libyan Jamahiriyah both play an important role in the Mediterranean, but both countries are aware of the differences in their roles, whence their conviction of the need for a constant and ample dialogue to avoid possible misunderstandings, diplomatic sources said. Italy, for example, kept Tripoli constantly briefed on its contacts with Malta which then led to the agreement guaranteeing the island's neutrality.

According to the sources, one central topic in Colombo's talks with Ash-Shahati, whom some experts consider the true chief of Libyan diplomacy despite 'Abd al-Salam at-Turayki position as foreign minister, was the Italians who work in the North African state.

They number an estimated sixteen thousand and, in recent months, some have been arrested for various reasons. The Foreign Ministry is responsible for their welfare. The sources said that there was no problem as regards economic cooperation between the two countries, which is very intense.

The international topics discussed included the fighting between Iran and Iraq and the Middle Eastern situation. On the latter point, Colombo illustrated the Italian and EEC position in favor of going beyond the Camp David agreements so as to involve all the interested parties in the negotiations and achieve a global and lasting settlement. The same problem will be on the agenda next Friday when Colombo will be meeting with Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Sa'ud al-Faysal, who is making an official visit to Rome.

Contacts with both the Jamahiriyah and Saudi Arabia are important from the viewpoint of energy supplies. In the first six months of 1980, according to statistics published yesterday, Libyan oil accounted for 5.5 percent of Italian needs and Saudi Arabia for 15.2 percent.

YUGOSLAV PRESIDENT, FOREIGN MINISTER ARRIVE FOR VISIT

Meet With President Pertini

LD171650 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1600 GMT 17 Dec 80

[Text] Yugoslav President Cvijetin Mijatovic arrived in Rome this afternoon on a 3-day visit. He is accompanied by Foreign Minister Josip Vrhovec. Shortly after his arrival, Mijatovic was received by President Pertini at the Quirinale.

International Issues Discussed

[Text] Yugoslav President Mijatovic, who is on a visit to Italy, and President Pertini discussed at the Quirinale the Polish situation and East-West relations in general. Analysis of the international situation did not give rise to optimism. Italy and Yugoslavia are preoccupied with the possible development of Polish events.

Recalling Tito's policy of protecting national independence and of the contribution which nations such as Yugoslavia and Italy can make to peace, Pertini observed that this policy was still dramatically topical. The president of the republic reiterated his condemnation of Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, a country, he said, which is struggling for its independence against the foreigner who has invaded its territory. Pertini expressed solidarity with the Polish people, who intend to keep alive the freedoms they have regained.

Mijatovic reaffirmed the desire to open even more ample prospects for Yugoslav-Italian relations in all fields, stressing that cooperation between the two countries as especially important in view of the fact that Europe and the world were shaken by grave crises.

International problems were also discussed by the foreign ministers of the two countries, Colombo and Vrhovec. It is believed that in this case, too, Poland was the main topic.

More on Mijatovic Talks

AU180847 Rome ANSA in English 0830 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] Rome, 18 Dec (ANSA)—Visiting Yugoslav Head of State Cvijetin Mijatovic and Italian President Sandro Pertini will continue their talks here this morning. Mijatovic arrived in Rome Wednesday afternoon for an official three-day visit, accompanied by Foreign Minister Josip Vrhovec.

Italy is the first country which a member of Yugoslavia's collective presidency has visited since the death of Marshal Josip Broz Tito. The 63-year-old Mijatovic, the representative of Bosnia-Hercegovina, is the presidency's duty chairman.

The two heads of state met yesterday for over an hour and a half. This was twice as long as expected. The two men talked at length of Tito and the nonalignment path upon which Yugoslavia embarked under his guidance. Pertini and Mijatovic analyzed the present international situation and noted that the two countries are in full agreement on most issues.

Italy and Yugoslavia are both concerned over the turn events in Poland might take. In fact, Yugoslavia may even be more concerned given its geopolitical position which makes it particularly sensitive to anything that might effect East-West ties.

Pertini and Mijatovic also touched on disarmament, (Yugoslavia launched a concrete initiative at the Madrid Conference for European Security and Cooperation), and security in the Mediterranean. Pertini congratulated Yugoslavia on the role she continues to play in the nonaligned movement in this post-Tito period.

Last night Pertini hosted an official dinner for the Yugoslav guests at the Quirinale Palace. Also present at the dinner was Premier Arnaldo Forlani, top state officials, numerous ministers and leaders in the world of politics, economics and culture. Pertini said that although he missed his old friend Tito, the current president of Yugoslavia had known how to walk with firmness in the footsteps of the late Belgrade leader.

For his part, Mijatovic voiced Yugoslavia's solidarity with Italy's earthquake victims. He said that he had come to Rome to reaffirm the continuity of the fruitful ties of an ever growing cooperation between the two countries. The Yugoslav president wound up his remarks saying that "I am certain that our talks will contribute to our future cooperation and a greater understanding, respect and friendship." Tomorrow the Yugoslav foreign minister and his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo will take part, accompanied by their respective delegations, in the second encounter between Pertini and Mijatovic.

The two foreign ministers Wednesday discussed general political issues and bilateral matters. The two ministers voiced satisfaction over economic exchanges between the two countries and the tendency to balance their trade which now tips in favor of Italy. The two men were pleased with the progress of talks on fishing in the Adriatic and spoke of the possibility of joint investment ventures in this field. They also noted the increased traffic across the Italo-Yugoslav border (up 80 percent over last year). Italian Premier Arnaldo Forlani is offering a luncheon for Mijatovic at Villa Madama today.

TANJUG Reports Pertini Remarks

LD172234 Belgrade TANJUG in English 2140 GMT 17 Dec 80

[Text] Rome, 17 Dec (TANJUG)--Italian President Sandro Pertini today said that Yugoslavia and Italy were united in their dedication to the ideals of peace, freedom and justice. He added that economic, cultural and political cooperation between the two countries was essential to both peoples and because of their common interests in the promotion of understanding and progress among the peoples in both the Balkans, and the Mediterranean. [as received]

President Pertini spoke at a dinner given here this evening in honour of his guest, President of the Presidency of Yugoslavia Cvijetin Mijatovic, who arrived in Rome earlier today on a two-day official and friendly visit to neighbouring Italy. He said he was pleased with President Mijatovic having chosen Italy as the first country he would visit on assuming the office. President Pertini spoke warmly about the role and significance of President Tito, who died last May and with whom, he said, he was linked by the bonds of friendship and common struggle for the independence of one's own people.

"Tito was not only the victorious leader of the Yugoslav partisan movement and people's revolution which made Yugoslavia a socialist country in independence and freedom. He was also one of the greatest defenders of the cause of peace," Pertini stated. The Italian president went on to say that "the concept of non-alignment--one of whose most authoritative and steadfast founders Tito was--contains the wish of the peoples to remain independent and military blocs and not to threaten anybody, but to be resolved and capable of protecting themselves against threats, foreign will and aggression." Pertini said that the world peace is indivisible and that "all people on our planet, large and small nations, the powerful and the weak are entitled to it".

"Our solidarity is directed to the people of Afghanistan, who are struggling for their independence against a foreign power which has attacked and occupied their country, and to the Polish people who want to live in the freedoms won by peaceful means," said Pertini. "The lesson which Tito, in this sense, gave to all has maintained and heightened its topicality since this eminent person no longer helps us with his courage and wisdom," he said. President Pertini said that "the more developed are obliged, in their own interest, to help the under-developed. On the world scale, prosperity lies in interdependence. The times of granting, which very often hides colonial and neo-colonial domination, are coming to an end."

Pertini noted that "the only stable solution can be one on the level of mutual solidarity outside some one else's frontiers, outside the blocs and beyond the differences in development." There have been many disagreements and clashes in the history of the Yugoslav and Italian peoples. Today, however, the commonality of the European destiny prevails. Let us consolidate it and make it resistant to all challenges, in a common advance of our two countries which, although different in terms of political identity remain close in their views on the major questions of the whole world."

PCE OPPOSES 'CARETAKER GOVERNMENT' FORMULA

LD171633 Barcelona LA VANGUARDIA in Spanish 10 Dec 80 p 15

[EFE report: "PCE Opposes Caretaker Government"]

[Text] The resolution approved by the PCE Central Committee expresses its opposition to the so-called caretaker government [gobierno de gestion], and it deems itself freed from its commitment to the institutions if any government change occurs which does not respect the Constitution. At the same time, the PCE calls for a mobilization of the people to defend their interests, opposes an early election and demands a change of policy, advocating a "government of progress."

Madrid, 9 December--The political resolution approved by the PCE Central Committee was published this afternoon. This resolution is the outcome of the debate on the political situation which took place during yesterday's session, on the basis of a report from the PCE Executive Committee's Standing Committee, which was set out by Simon Sanchez Montero.

This resolution, which was approved with no votes against, states, among other things:

It believes that the situation is grave, with a new factor, perhaps the most dangerous, existing. This being the reemergence of a real vacuum in Spain's Government, which is emboldening the most reactionary and extreme forces, creating anxiety in military spheres, and causing forces of the economic and political right to propse government formulas such as the "caretaker" formula and others, which might lie outside parliamentary solutions and would mean the beginning of the end of democracy.

The Central Committee believes that in order to surmount the situation, Communists and Democrats should work vigorously and rapidly in two directions:

Call for Mobilization of People

First, to be capable of mobilizing in a sustained and many-sided manner, with initiatives at all levels, the workers, residents and citizens in defense of their specific interests against unemployment, against terrorism and in support of democracy; against the high cost of living and for just collective agreements and for civil and autonomy rights. To this end, the official resolution continues, the Central Committee "calls for initiatives in support of a progressive divorce law and university autonomy law."

Second, to secure through increasingly widespread pressure from public opinion a change of government and policy. For this, the resolution states, together with the aforesaid, anunderstanding among the leftwing forces at both trade union and political levels is essential. The Central Committee therefore believes that the restoration of unity of action between the Workers Commissions and the General Workers Union, as well as cooperation between the PCE and the Spanish Socialist Workers Party [PSCE] to pave the way for a policy of democratic unity, is of particular importance.

Government of Progress

This is a policy, the resolution adds, which would make possible the formation of a new parliamentary majority from which a government of progress would have to emerge, which, supported by a broad social basis, would be capable of resolving the three great issues of our democratic consolidation: unemployment as a central factor of the economic crisis; terrorism, as a maximum factor of political destabilization; and the autonomies, as a decisive link in the configuration of the new state.

With respect to what this government might be like, the resolution states: "A government with these characteristics, which might be formed at the ministerial level by representatives of the Union of the Democratic Center and the PSOE, with a program agreed among all the democratic forces, would have our determined cooperation and, we are convinced, the support of the workers and of the vast majority of the population."

No to Early Election

Last, the approved resolution states: "The Central Committee is convinced that 1983 cannot be reached with the present government and policy without an extremely grave danger of political regression. It does not deem it desirable to hold an early election, although as a party we might emerge strengthened from it. The urgent task at this moment is to secure another government and another policy, within respect for the Constitution and for parliament, and thus prevent the current vacuum, from leading us to another government and another policy outside the Constitution, which would mean the end of democracy in our country."

The PCE Central Committee meeting, which decided to order a plan for the possible reappearance of the daily newspaper MUNDO OBRERO--the Communist Party's official organ--concluded in Madrid yesterday. This plan is to be examined and debated by the PCE Central Committee before it is approved. It was agreed during the meeting that the PCE organ's financial position became untenable in due course, necessitating its suspension as a daily newspaper, and it was admitted that the party did not support MUNDO OBRERO sufficiently. The recent visit to China by a party delegation headed by Santiago Carillo was also broached at the meeting.

PCE'S AZCARATE CITED ON POLAND, MOSCOW TIES

LD171627 Madrid EL PAIS in Spanish 12 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] "The PCE would sever relations with the CPSU if there were an armed intervention in Poland," PCE International Relations Section Chief Manuel Azcarate stated yesterday.

The Spanish Communist leader said that a Soviet armed intervention would be "crazy in terms of peace, European security and the development of socialism itself."

Azcarate reiterated the PCE's support for the Polish workers and asserted that the events in Poland "are the general reflection of the crisis in East Europe, where freedom and democracy are necessary." The evolution of these same events represents for the Spanish Communists "confirmation of the basic thesis of Eurocommunism."

The PCE international relations section chief is convinced that if the break with the USSR occurs, "there would be a debate within the party, but the opposition to the decision to sever relations with the Soviets would have less impact than the criticisms of the invasion of Czechoslovakia and Afghanistan."

Last, he expressed his conviction that if the evolution in Poland went so far as to create multiparty formulas, this new model would work in favor of economic consolidation.

DEFENSE FORCES SEEK EXTRA 20 PERCENT ON BUDGET

LD161601 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 11 Dec 80 part 1 p 7

[Christian Broendum report: "Defense Forces Must Seek 1.5 Billion Korner In Additional Funds For 1980"]

[Text] Steeply rising fuel costs and disadvantageous exchange rate flucutations between the krone and the pound and dollar are the main reasons why the Defense Ministry has had to seek a record budget supplement for 1980.

According to Defense Ministry Section Chief Birgit Reeh the defense forces have spent 1.5 billion kroner more than estimated in the 1980 budget, representing an additional expenditure of 20 percent. In the 1980 budget defense spending was fixed at 7.3 billion kroner. At January 1979 prices, with the increase, actual spending totaled 8.8 billion kroner used in the defense forces this year.

The 1981 defense budget proposal is contained in the draft budget bill, at present being discussed by the Folketing and is fixed at 8.1 billion kroner, at January 1980 prices. If the defense budget has to be adjusted by 20 precent next year because of wage and price rises, defense spending will amount to 10.3 billion kroner.

Rising expenditure, principally on fuel and foreign material, has not brought the defense forces more soldiers or artillery. On the contrary, Defense Minister Poul Sogaard has just announced that the army's permanent staff is 1,000 men short in relation to the numbers fixed in the current defense agreement.

The 20-percent adjustment in 1980 defense spending as a result of inflation must be seen against the background of last year's adjustment, which totaled 16 percent. There were considerable fuel price rises in 1979.

It is still not certain how much the government will agree to seek in the additional spending adjustment for 1980. The additional spending proposal will be presented to the Folketing at the end of January. But under the terms of the 1980 budget bill the government has set aside 13.1 billion kroner for price and wage adjustments, which correspond to a little under 11 percent; of this the defense forces have asked for 1.5 billion kroner.

VAYRYNEN INTERVIEWED ON SOVIET TREATY EXTENSION

LD171332 Helsinki Domestic Service in Finnish 0500 GMT 17 Dec 80

[Text] The Diet continued its budget debate until after midnight. The fiercest debate on next year's budget concerned Foreign Ministry matters—development aid, arms exports and Foreign Ministry appointments. The chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Kalevi Sorsa, took up the extension of the Finnish-Soviet Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance Treaty. In the view of Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen the extension of the treaty is not topical just now. The Soviet-Finnish Treaty is in force until 1990. Pentti Luume interviewed Minister Paavo Vayrynen:

[Begin recording] [Luume] Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen, chairman of the Diet Foreign Affairs Committee Kalevi Sorsa spoke about an extension of the validity of the Finnish-Soviet Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance Treaty. Is such an extension topical just now?

[Answer] No, it is not. If we had thought the extension of the treaty topical now, naturally we would have used the president's state visit in this respect. But naturally the extension of the treaty will come up in the next few years as the treaty is in force only for another 10 years. It has always been extended in good time before the expiration of its validity.

[Question] You said in the next few years. President Kekkonen's term of office comes to an end in 1984. Would the extension of the treaty take place before the ending of this term?

[Answer] Naturally the parties to the treaty must have discussions on when the time would be suitable for the extension of the treaty. I cannot state what would be a suitable time. We have to discuss and agree about it together.

[Question] Which side takes an initiative in this matter, Finland or the Soviet Union?

[Answer] Both can, of course, take the initiative. On the Finnish side there are at present no immediate plans for such an initiative, but of course we are ready at any time to have discussions on the extension of the treaty.

[Question] What about the content of the treaty? Will its wording remain the same as in the present treaty?

[Answer] The treaty has been extended twice without any alteration in its content. We know of no facts that would indicate any need for a revision of the treaty. [end recording]

That was an interview with Foreign Minister Paavo Vayrynen. The Diet will continue the budget debate at noon today.

SAARINEN ON USSR INVASION THREAT TO POLAND

WA171415 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 10 Dec 80 p 3

[Tor Hognas dispatch from Helsinki]

[Text] Only if socialism is in actual danger will the Soviets invade Poland, said the leader of the Finnish Communist Party, Aarne Saarinen, to DAGENS NYHETER. He believes and hopes, however, that military intervention will not be necessary, despite the fact that the situation seems serious.

Aarne Saarinen for a long time has opposed military intervention, and especially among socialist countries. He condemned the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968.

Saarinen said that the workers' actions for expanded democracy and for various rights were to the great advantage for socialism. But there is a danger in going too far and beginning to attack the socialist social system itself.

"Lust For Power"

"There are indications that people in Poland are not satisfied with the results reached, but have seized by a lust for power, and demand more and more. This is dangerous," said Saarinen. He thinks that the significant role of outside forces in the current process has been exaggerated.

"Of course there can be found foreign forces in the background which surely have paid attention to the situation. But the main cause for the disturbances in Poland is sufficiently enough explained by all the failures in the society which have provoked a strong dissatisfaction among the people. And the Poles themselves have observed these failures without having had anyone to report for them how things were."

"The cause for the unsatisfactory state of affairs is to be sought among the Polish leaders. Persons in positions of leadership have not grown with their responsibilities but instead have taken advantage of their positions for purely selfish ends," said Saarinen.

SWEDEN

EUROPEAN DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE PROPOSED

LD171325 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 13 Dec 80 p 6

[Claes-Goeran Kjellander report: "Sweden Proposes Disarmament Meeting"]

[Excerpt] Sweden will shortly put forward a detailed proposal for a European disarmament conference. We should not be too optimistic in the present political climate, but there is no reason to "terminate efforts for disarmament."

Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten made this statement in an interpellation in the RIKSDAG on Friday [12 December], the day before the giant peace demonstration organized by Swedish women's organizations.

Ullsten mentioned two reasons which indicate that a European disarmament conference could be arranged. First, the proposal is supported by many nations, and second, it would be troublesome for the superpowers if the security conference in Madrid ended without results.

The debate concerned the possibilities of establishing a nuclear-free zone in Scandinavia and stemmed from interpellations from Eva Hjelmstrom [Left Party-Communists) and Gunnel Jonang (Center Party).

"Today Scandinavia is a de facto nuclear-free zone," Ullsten said. "However, if a formal agreement on such a zone is to be achieved, account must be taken of the incidence of nuclear arms in the vicinity of Scandinavia, thus the Baltic should also be included in the zone.

"Further, the tactical and strategic nuclear arms stationed near the zone would have to be withdrawn since they by definition would become superfluous if a nuclear-free zone were established."

REAGAN TEAM 'NOT A PARTICULARLY BRILLIANT' GROUP

LD151309 Stockholm SVENSKA DAGBLADET in Swedish 13 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Reagan's Men"]

[Text] Forming a new U.S. administration has turned out to be more difficult than Ronald Reagan had envisaged but on Thursday his first eight appointments were announced. They are not a particularly brilliant collection. Several well-known names have said no.

The greatest attention has been given to Caspar Weinberger, who will become defense secretary. In the past he served under President Nixon, as budget chief among other posts, and was then given the name "Cap the knife" because of his eagerness to make savings. Weinberger's tight rein will be needed if U.S. defenses are to be strengthened without military expenditure becoming astronomic.

It remains to be seen, however, whether Weinberger has the diplomatic talent needed to coordinate NATO's defense efforts.

It is also worth noting that Donald Regan, chairman of the well-known Wall Street firm of Merril Lunch, will become secretary of the treasury. It looks as if commerce and industry will be well represented in the new administration, but past experience shows that businessmen often lose their way in Washington's political jungle.

To sum up, the eight appointments indicate that Reagan will primarily recruit his staff from the moderate camp and this displeases his most faithful supporters who had hoped for an administration with a bolder political profile.

CARRINGTON WELCOMES GENERAL HAIG'S APPOINTMENT

[By Tom Momullan, PA Diplomatic Correspondent]

[Excerpt] Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington today offered a warm welcome to the nomination of General Alexander Haig as the American secretary of state. President-elect Ronald Reagan's nomination of Gen Haig has still to be confirmed by the American Senate in what is expected to be a difficult session. The Foreign Office released the text of a message sent by Lord Carrington to Gen Haig which said: "I was delighted to hear of your appointment as secretary of state, which gives me great personal pleasure. I look forward to working with you in the challenging problems we face in common. I hope there may be an early opportunity to discuss them with you."

PYM PESSIMISTIC ON DEFENSE EXPENDITURE OPTIONS

[Nicholas Comfort report: "Backbencheers' Warning Over Defence Cuts"]

[Text] Mr Pym last night gave conservative Mps a gloomy assessment of Britain's options for fulfilling expanded military commitments and maintaining the purchase of up-to-date equipment in view of recently-announced cutbacks in defence spending. The defence secretary also stressed that the early delivery of warships and other items had placed a strain on Defence Ministry finances. He voiced the hope that cutbacks in other fields could be limited. Much of the audience left a 75-minute private meeting of the party's backbench Defence Committee believing that the political battle over the contribution of the defence programme to public spending cuts was far from over.

A number of the 50 Mps present warned the whip in attendance that there would be trouble in the Commons if the economies resulted in the cancellation of advanced weapons systems as forecast in THE DAILY TELEGRAPH on Monday. Mr Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge) and Mr Tony Harlow (Northampton North) were among critics who argued that there was little point in having well-paid forces if they were deprived of the fuel and equipment enabling them to fight. Others accused treasury ministers of lacking political judgment in seeking to trim the increase in the defence budget to which the Conservative manifesto committed the government.

While Mr Pym made it clear that he intended to do his best with the resources available, there was strong sentiment that he was being asked to do a well-nigh impossible job. Last night's meeting coincided with suggestions that the prime minister was taking personally criticism of individual economies which the Cabinet decisions on defence spending will mean. Mr. Pym stressed in this context last night that, even with the economies, Britain's record was better than that of most of her allies, with defence spending taking up five percent of the gross national product.

In the course of the cabinet argument Mr Pym left the inference with colleagues that he would resign if asked to give up too much. Although the economies in the 1981-82 defence budget were kept down to 200 million pounds, he has made it clear that Britain's capabilities will suffer in consequence. Mr Pym told last night's meeting that extra commitments were opening up for Britain outside NATO and outside Europe, leaving the implication that they would prove hard to meet. He fuelled speculation about cuts in the equipment programme by saying that there would have to be economies in the short term and by listing only a few specific programmes which were safe. However, doubts remained at the end of the meeting about the projects reported earlier this week to be on the cancellation list, among them the Sea Eagle and Sky Flash Mark 2 missile for the Navy and RAF.

CP SUPPORTS POLISH EFFORTS, CONDEMNS INTERVENTION

[Article by Gerry Pocock, head of UK CP International Department: "Strengthening Poland's Socialism"]

[Excerpts] All friends of Poland will be anxiously following events in that country. They will want to see a further strengthening of socialism and democracy based on the immense power of the people as expressed in the last few months. The Communist Party of Great Britain said in its statement of September 14 this year that the crisis had arisen because of economic errors and grave deficiencies in socialist democracy.

The Communist Party went on to refer to the previous crises of 1956, 1970 and 1976 in Poland which not only revealed gross violations of socialist democracy, but also "a failure, even after these were revealed, to make the necessary changes with the speed and on the scale that was needed." It is this past failure that explains much of the determination of the strikers this year.

Socialism has brought enormous advances in Poland. Through the efforts of the Polish people and the assistance of other socialist countries, the pre-war backwardness was overcome. Living standards, social benefits, economic growth,have been transformed. Such developments could never have been brought about without the active participation of people in many ways. We should reject the false picture of a Poland in which there has been no progress, no democracy, no trade union.

Equally false is the notion that the developments of recent months are a threat to socialism, that the developments of an autonomous trade union movement, the demands for greater press and media freedom, for stricter accountability, for changes in the implementing of inner party democracy and the functioning of the Polish Parliament. But it also has to be said that the socialism that prevailed in Poland till recently has also meant corruption, undemocratic measures and resistance to criticism. It is to the credit of the Polish United Workers Party [PUWP] that its leadership has openly admitted this. It is disturbing to hear continued reports of local attempts to block the positive developments that have been achieved. It is clear that the process inside the PUWP of winning active support for the policies adopted by the Central Committee is far from complete.

The process taking place in Poland is a difficult but unavoidable one and has to be seen in that context. In this respect we can only disagree and be alarmed at the tone and content of the widely publicised statement in the Czechoslovak communist party paper.

Outside intervention by a neighbouring socialist state or states in whatever form and on whatever grounds can never solve problems arising within the society and is contrary to the accepted communist principles. It will be the earnest hope of communists and the friends of Poland that the changes unfolding in socialist Poland, the mass involvement of millions of people in developing new trade unions and other democratic reforms, and the positive response given by the PUWP to these developments, will continue.

The reaction among Western governments to the complex events and developments in socialist Poland can only be described as the most outrageous hypocrisy. This hypocritical concern by such as Carter and Thatcher and NATO leaders has nothing to do with concern for the welfare of the people of Poland--economic, political or military--but is designed to fuel ani-Communism, East-West tension and provide further justification for the freezing of detente and escalating the arms race.

KHARAVYI: HAIG'S APPOINTMENT 'HOSTILE, DANGEROUS'

NC180755 Nicosia KHARAVYI in Greek 18 Dec 80 p 3

[From the "Views and Comments" column: "Dangerous Appointment"]

[Text] There has been strong concern--even among U.S. political circles--because of General Haig's appointment to the post of U.S. secretary of state. As a result, militant reaction within the congress itself is threatened. The former commander of the NATO military forces in Europe has won--with his actions--the reputation of being a hard-core hawk and a shortsighted politician who views military might as an imperative means to resolve international differences and other problems. Haig's name has been linked with arbitrary actions in the dirty Vietnam war and with the shameful Watergate scandal. Given these facts, there cannot be any favorable forecasts concerning the foreign policy of a great power by a man with the reputation and past of General Haig, particularly during a period of deterioration in the world political climate and of the existence of explosive problems that require a cool and prudent approach.

In our geographical region General Haig is well known for his intensive activities in connection with the problems of the southeastern wing of NATO, his stress on Turkey's vital strategic position for the imperialist interests and his inclusion of the Cyprus problem within this framework. His role in the complete conversion of Turkey into an aggressive U.S. bridgehead has been decisive. With General Haig at his new post, the most reasonable thing to expect is that the U.S. policy on Cyprus will become still more hostile and dangerous.

KLIRIDHIS PREDICTS DEADLOCK IN INTERCOMMUNAL TALKS

[Excerpts] Democratic Rally Chairman Glavkos Kliridhis believes that next February, when substantive discussion on the Cyprus problem will be held at the negotiating table, the talks will come to a deadlock. Kliridhis stressed this last night at the Katsellis Hill Hotel in Nicosia where he was the guest of the Young Professionals Union of Cyprus. Kliridhis said: Until today,the talks were confined to the exchange of proposals by the interlocutors who were delaying discussion on the substance. The good climate that was being advertised only amounted to smiles. The Cyprus Government does not possess either the possibility or the ability to face a sad reality.

Kliridhis added that arguments alone cannot convince the Turks to make concessions. Along with the talks, other available means of pressure must be employed against them. Specifically, we must properly utilize Greece's increased political-military importance so that the West may pressure Turkey to make concessions. Greece's importance has increased because of CENTO's collapse.

The CENTO line of defense--Turkey was one of the links in this line--has broken down because Iran was withdrawn, due to the change in its regime, while Pakistan, following the Soviet invasion into Afghanistan, is now solely concerned about its own defense.

The CENTO line of defense was protecting the Arabian oil fields and the flow of oil to the West. Following CENTO's collapse, the new line of defense for the protection of the aforesaid interests begins east of Egypt, passes by Suez, south of Cyprus, Kriti and Peloponnisos and ends up at Italy.

Thus, since the West and particularly NATO desire a solution of the Greek-Turkish differences, and in view of the fact that the Greek region (Kriti and Peloponnisos) is more important for the alliance than Turkey, it is up to Greece to persuade the West to pressure Turkey for concessions in the Cyprus problem.

Of course, the Turks can be pressured, but not to the extent that they would be compelled to withdraw from NATO.

The solution of the Cyprus problem, Kliridhis added, would also serve the East because the consolidation of the present status would lead to de facto partition and, therefore, to NATOization.

Kliridhis clarified that the solution of the Cyprus problem will solely come from negotiations. And if the dialogue is to progress—in addition to pressuring Turkey—we must invoke the pertinent article in the UN Charter and ask the Security Council to appoint missions and committees of experts which will make concrete recommendations for bridging the differences and implementing the Makarios-Denktas guidelines.

Answering questions: Kliridhis reiterated that we should not have rejected the joint U.S.-Canadian-British plan. By rejecting it, we have lost Famagusta because the Turks were not going to reject it, they were in urgent need of 16 billion dollars in order to survive financially; and they needed the West.

Referring to the internal front, Kliridhis said that there is no such front. If there is going to be such a front, parliamentary elections must be held and the political parties must clarify their positions. And if the party of the president of the republic comes out of the elections as a minority party, then for reasons of moral sensitiveness the president must resign so that presidential elections can be held.

Answering another question, the Democratic Rally chairman said that the Soviet Union as well had given the green light for the invasion in order to foil the enosis of Cyprus with Greece. He added: I had invited the Soviet Union on two occasions—once in Cyprus and again in Vienna—to step in and put an end to the invasion. I had even offered them bases. The second time in Vienna, the Soviet observer told me that he was going to convey our request to his government and that he would reply to our offer. I am still waiting for that reply. Kliridhis documented all his answers, quoting from documents and citing dates, names and places.

ATAKOL MEETS WITH WALDHEIM IN NEW YORK

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus Foreign Affairs, Defense, Tourism and Information Minister Kenan Atakol, who is currently in New York, met with UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim for talks. In a statement following the meeting which lasted about an hour, Atakol said that the present state of the intercommunal talks were assessed during the talks. Pointing out that views were exchanged on the various aspects of the Cyprus problem, Atakol said: I told the UN secretary general that the Turkish side would continue to adopt a favorable and constructive stand for the positive conclusion of the intercommunal talks. Our hope is that the other party will also adopt a realist stand and will abandon its negative approach.

Meanwhile, it is reported that the UN secretary general will meet today with the foreign minister of the Greek Cypriot administration, Nikolaos Rolandhis.

Rolandhis' Conference With Waldheim

NC162000 Nicosia Domestic Television Service in Greek 1830 GMT 16 Dec 80

[Text] Foreign Minister Rolandhis had a meeting in New York this evening with UN Secretary General Waldheim. A general review of developments in the Cyprus problem was conducted at the meeting which took place in the UN building and lasted for 2 hours. The meeting was attended on the Cyprus side by Mavromatis, the island's permanent delegate at the United Nations, and on the UN side by the assistant secretary general for special political affairs, Perez de Cuellar, and the secretary general's special representative in Cyprus, Gobbi. Rolandhis will have another meeting with Waldheim on Thursday.

Yesterday Waldheim had a separate meeting with the Turkish Cypriot, Mr Atakol. Referring to Foreign Minister Rolandhis' visit to New York for the purpose of meeting the UN secretary general, the government spokesman made the following statement:

It is hereby clarified that Foreign Minister Rolandhis' visit for consultations with Dr Waldheim during the recess in the intercommunal talks and after the completion of three rounds of negotiations, has no connection with an earlier invitation to Mr Rolandhis and Mr Atakol for meetings in New York within previously defined common limits and while the dialogue was in the midst of developing. Mr Rolandhis, adds the government spokesman, has always had close contacts with Dr Waldheim, and their meeting today is the fifth this year. These meetings are both useful and necessary and will be continued.

If Mr Atakol finds it expedient to be visiting New York at the same time for any contacts of his own, says the government spokesman, this does not concern the Cyprus Government which cannot control Mr Atakol's movements. In any case, Mr Atakol was in New York and had contacts there also last September, that is, at the same time when Mr Rolandhis was in the city.

The advisability of the foreign minister meeting or not meeting with the UN secretary general cannot depend on any moves that Mr Atakol may make.

AKEL DELEGATION HOLDS TALKS IN BELGRADE WITH LCY

NC151910 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 15 Dec 80

[Text] An AKEL Central Committee delegation has held talks in Belgrade with Mr Mojsov, chairman of the LCY Central Committee Presidium, who in 1977 served as president of the UN General Assembly.

According to an AKEL statement, Mr Mojsov has given assurances that Yugoslavia is working toward a peaceful solution of the Cypriot problem in the interest of all Cypriots—Greek's and Turks—away from any foreign interference in the internal affairs of Cyprus. The statement adds that the Yugoslav side has also stressed that any other procedure or activity toward a solution on Cyprus than the intercommunal talks would be doomed to failure and would cause new tribulations and tragedies for the Cypriot people.

AKEL LEADING MEMBERS SEEK PAPAIOANNOU'S REMOVAL

[Text] According to reports received by I SIMERINI from sources close to the AKEL leadership, the recent visit to Cyprus by KKE-Exterior leader Florakis took place at the invitation of AKEL Secretary General Papaioannou and aimed at bridging the differences among high ranking AKEL officials.

It is specifically reported that part of the AKEL leadership seeks to remove Papaioannou from the office of party secretary general and to replace him with a younger leading member.

Dinos Katsouridhis, son of Yiannis Katsouridhis, who is a member of the party's Political Bureau, is among those who are proposed as Papaioannou's replacement. Another candidate for the office of AKEL secretary general, in case Papaioannou is removed, is AKEL house member Dinos Konstandinou.

The AKEL leadership has close ties with the KKE-Exterior while its relations with the KKE-Interior are not good, particularly following KHARAVYI comments that accused the KKE-Interior of being a tool of imperialism.

EDEK LEADER DECRIES U.S. CYPRIOT POLICIES

LD171503 Damascus AL-BA'TH in Arabic 9 Dec 80 p 3

[Interview given to unnamed AL-BA'TH correspondent in Nicosia by Cyprus United Democratic Union of the Center Party [EDEK] Chairman Dr Vasos Lissaridhis--date not given]

[Excerpts] Nicosia--[Question] Dr Lissaridhis, the Cyprus issue continues to be debated. How do you view this issue and what, in your opinion, are the effective forces in it?

[Answer] The conflict is not between the Greek Cypriots and the Turkish Cypriots as the West tries to make out. It is a conflict between the Cypriot people and American imperialism, which wants to turn Cyprus into a springboard for aggression against Arab progressive forces. Occupation is used as a means to achieve this objective, exactly as Israel is being used as a policemen in the Middle East. It would be naive to believe that the United States and its tools would abandon their plans willingly. It is only when we render its plans infeasible that we open the way to a just solution of the Cyprus problem. The current discussions are not in fact between Greek and Turkish Cypriots, but between Cyprus and both Ankara and the United States. Therefore, hopes for the negotiations are bleak.

[Question] Cyprus is approaching general elections. How do you view these elections in the light of the present internal situation and what repercussions will they have on the current negotiations between the two communities?

[Answer] The elections are being held in very special circumstances. America and various political quarters in Cyprus are trying to convince the people that there is a solution in order to deceive them and win their votes, while, in fact, they have accepted capitulation and occupation, just as As-Sadat used "false pragmatism" in order to achieve a solution.

In this way they hope to suppress the forces resisting the imperialist schemes--EDEK--as much as they can. I will not be surprised if Turkish community leader Denktas persuades the people that a solution concerning Famagusta is possible so as to turn the refugees against us. However, the Cyprus battle will continue, the forces of resistance will grow and the imperialist schemes will collapse eventually. The elections will reveal other things as well. None of the parties will achieve an absolute majority in parliament, and this will weaken the position of any future president. Nobody can predict the percentage because there are many floating votes. Some parties have been formed for the sole purpose of weakening EDEK's power. However, I believe that there is a good chance of fighting the election because the EDEK party cannot be ignored in any efforts to resolve the Cyprus issue.

[Question] Israel is trying to portray the Arab-Zionist conflict as the main conflict in the area. What is Israel's objective and what connection do the events in the area have with this attempt?

[Answer] Together with America and its circles and multinational economic affiliates, Israel is the archenemy of the area. Zionism is one of the worst forms of racism and indeed imperialism. Israel is not only the enemy of the Arab cause and the force that is oppressing the Palestinian people, but also the enemy of the entire area, because it supports the imperialist plans for domination, which coincide with its own expansionist plans. The main conflict is between imperialism and Zionism on the one hand and the people who are fighting for real independence on the other.

[Question] From his statements, Reagan appears to be more confident of America's might than Carter, who began his term of office by talking about human rights, although his practices later contradicted all his statements. In your opinion, what repercussions is Reagan's mentality likely to have on international issues, particularly the Middle East issue?

[Answer] Although we do not believe that there is any basic difference between the American policymakers, we must expect from an arrogant and ultrareactionary man like Reagan a further deterioration in the situation. We must also remember that his entourage consists mainly of reactionaries who are held in little esteem by progressive public opinion, such as Kissinger and others. For this reason, we must be prepared to confront the possibility of heightening hostility, for a time at least, because of Reagan's election. I believe that Reagan will prove harmful not only to the world public but also to America itself.

[Question] How does the Syrian-Soviet friendship treaty fit into Arab and international events?

[Answer] I believe that this treaty is a very important development which is greatly admired by all progressive forces not only in Syria but in the area as well. I believe it is an achievement for the people in Syria and for the party, the president and the area.

PAPANDREOU CALLS FOR NEW ECONOMIC POLICIES

AT171910 AThens Domestic Television Service in Greek 1900 GMT 17 Dec 80

[Text] The state budget debate continued for the second day today in the Chamber of Deputies. Majority opposition leader and PASOK Chairman Andreas Papandreou was the first speaker. He said the government attempts to present the crisis which rages in the country's economy as an extension of the world capitalist crisis which does exist and has a structural crisis. Yet, he added, the Greek crisis has different dimensions which are far greater than presented and, unless there is a new economic course, our economy will be led to bankruptcy.

Papandreou then reviewed the country's economic situation and said that inflation, unemployment and a shrinkage of investments and the national product are characterics of our economy.

Specifically referring to unemployment, the PASOK chairman said that while the government claims that the unemployment percentage in Greece amounts to only 2.5 percent, official coordination figures present it at 6 percent and EEC figures mention a 15 percent unemployment in Greece.

On investments, Papandreou said that what is of vital importance is to create new investment opportunities, and added that PASOK's position is that creation of agricultural-industrial cooperatives is a basic prerequisite for the recuperation of our economy.

Continuing, the leader of the majority opposition party accused the government for its income policy and said the great demand of the workers is implementation of an adjustment of worker's income on the basis of the cost of living index. The government, he added, only gives indefinite promises while the workers income is being usurped by taxation.

In conclusion, Papandreou said that in view of elections the government follows a scorched earth policy through numerous grants to the people. He called on the prime minister to propose dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies and new elections.

I KATHIMERINI: 40 PERCENT OF GREEKS SUPPORT EEC

[Text] Four out of every 10 Greeks support the country's accession to the EEC and only approximately two out of 10 have a contrary view. The remainder either refused an opinion or did not reply. These were the results of the first official opinion poll on Greek public opinion conducted by ICAP in cooperation with parallel EEC services known as "Eurobarometer."

The full details of this opinion poll will be announced next month together with the results from the other nine EEC member states, which are incorporated in the No. 14 "Eurobarometer" report. A summary of the results of this opinion poll were published yesterday by the Athens Bureau of the EEC at the same time that the map "of the Europe of the 10," was presented to representatives of the press.

The opinion poll in our country was conducted on 1,000 persons over 15 years of age, distributed over the 9 major regions of the country (Continental Greece, Peloponnisos, Ionian Islands, Ipiros, Makedhonia, Thraki, Kriti, and Aegean islands) and is a representative example. The opinion poll was conducted between 9 and 30 October.

According to results of the opinion poll, accession was supported as follows:

--A positive fact: 38 percent;
--A negative fact: 21 percent
--Neither negative nor positive: 28 percent
--no reply: 13 percent

Other characteristics of the opinion poll are the following:

A greater member of those over 40 years of age were in support of accession while women and younger people generally expressed a contrary opinion.

From the viewpoint of political position those who are in the rightwing front are more favorable than those in the center or the left. According to an explanation supplied by those questioned, political positions were defined by those questioned irrespective of the party to which they may possibly belong.

NEWSPAPERS DISCUSS ISSUES INVOLVED IN U.S. BASES

TO VIMA Sees Complications

AT171355 Athens TO VIMA in Greek 17 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] "Complications" over basic responsibilities to be ultimately kept by Greek commanders on U.S. bases are, according to TO VIMA reports, the main cause for delay in submission of the four Greek amendments to the new Greek-U.S. economic and defense cooperation agreement. The Greek counterproposal will be submitted to the Americans by the end of this week. It will include only general principles of the agreement as well as the basis for defense support and economic and technical cooperation in the sector of the war industry, with no prospect that the four amendments will be submitted before next month. This raises questions on the way in which relevant negotiations will be conducted, given the fact that the U.S. side will have no knowledge of the full text of the Greek counterproposal and its probable alternate conditions.

As already reported by TO VIMA, Greece supports the view that the Greek commander on each base must have operational control while, by contrast, Washington wants to keep this responsibility fully under the U.S. joint commander at least in name so that the Greek commander is virtually turned into a joint commander with "decorative responsibilities" over inspection, control and so forth.

At the same time, the Greek Government seeks to bind the U.S. side under the condition that the bases will not be used for operations outside NATO's area. Washington on the other hand wants to leave this "issue" open so that a possible "expansion" of the role of the bases will not be subject to advance conditions.

Under these conditions it must be considered certain that the new agreement will be signed only after the new U.S. administration takes over and under the conditions that the new agreement will not be subject to debate by the Greek Chamber of Deputies before next February.

The delay in negotiations on the bases issue must also be related to difficulties appearing in negotiations over the country's reintegration within NATO and specifically to the question of boundaries of the area over which the new proposed Larisa headquarters will have control.

Certain other complications also appeared during NATO talks on the Greek forces which will be under alliance command and those under national control.

A group of NATO staff officers has already visited the bases for Mirage and Phantom aircraft both in Kriti and Larisa and conferred with Greek senior airforce officers on the "deployment" of airforce units. It appears, however, these talks have reached no definite conclusions since both sides appear to insist on their views in principle.

'Clear Warning' by RIZOSPASTIS

[From the "Radical" column: "Clear Warnings"]

[Text] It is very certain that both sides--the U.S. and the official Greek side--are in a great hurry to close the bases issue. Elemental wisdom, however, would dictate to the government of "New Democracy" to take into a more serious consideration not only the feelings of the masses but also the positions of neighboring socialist and Arab countries which are subject to the U.S. adventurist policies. The warnings of the Libyan foreign minister were extremely clear and emphatic: "Any incursion against Libya," he said, "which will originate from a U.S. military base in the area, could possibly create problems between Libya and the country which is host to such a base."

It is obvious that the hints of the Libyan foreign minister also refer to the government of "New Democracy," and confirm, in the most official way, that the presence of foreign bases on Greek territory is a fundamental obstacle to development of a bipartite relations with neighboring countries. They also prove the correctness of the view that our country's involvement in cold war imperialist goals in the area will have wider reprecussions, both political and economic, which are already "counting" in a negative way for Greece.

Naturally the government insists on its demagogic declarations about the peaceful and pro-Arab orientation of its foreign policy. These were also reiterated by Prime Minister Rallis last week. The mouth-closing answer came from the "other side," the Arab countries. This answer demonstrated in the most convincing way how essential and realistic it is to pursue the prospect of a different foreign policy, the policy of friendship and cooperation with all nations.

MESIMVRINI Reports No Discussions

[Text] Yesterday morning Defense Minister E. Averof was visited at the Greek Pentagon by U.S. charges d'affaires [as published] (who is also head of the U.S. committee on base negotiations) M. Kovner.

Although nothing was officialy announced on the meeting, authoritative sources explained that the visit had a "purely personal" character.

Referring to press reports on his recent meeting with U.S. Ambassador McCloskey, E. Averof yesterday explained that there was no reference to the base issue during their conversation.

Averof-McCloskey Meeting

AT171045 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 17 Dec 80 p 2

[From the "Radical" column: "McCloskey...Recommends"]

[Text] Absolute silence covers the surprise meeting between the U.S. ambassador and Averof immediately after the defense minister's return from NATO headquarters. The content of their conversation was kept as secret as was the meeting itself. Reports published yesterday lead to the conclusion that the McCloskey-Averof meeting could in no way be described as a usual contact between a foreign diplomatic mission and the Greek government because, according to these reports, the U.S. ambassador asked the minister "to assist the U.S. proposal for bases in Greece," so that the relevant agreement could be signed as soon as possible.

It is understandable that one should ask: Why did the U.S. ambassador specifically address himself to Averof? Are there any precedents which could have encouraged the Washington representative to take this step? What sort of assistance did he request from the minister?

One cannot fail to point out that during other instances in the past, particularly on the even of reintegration within NATO, there were peculiar meetings between Averof and U.S. representative and that all these meetings were also kept secret. Over and above the question of the special "preference" which U.S. personalities appear to have for the minister of national defense, there is also a more general issue--the provocative activities of the representative from Washington in our country which go beyond any formal diplomatic custom.

Naturally, the mentality of the "overlord" must be related to McCloskey's behavior. His attempt to lead, in one way or another the government's political practices on certain problems of the country, does not impress anyone. The most important thing is that the official Greek Government does not appear in any way put out by his interventionist activities. This is because its own problem is not in the various interventions and the dictates of the various McCloskeys nor even in the entire issue of U.S. bases and the obligations inherent in the signing of the new agreement. The government's "delicacy" is not affected by such trifles...The problem facing the rightwing is how to "force" the new chains of subjugation upon the Greek people. It knows well that things are now far more difficult, judging on the basis of the experience from "reintegration." Could it be that once again McCloskey offered his "valuable recommendations?"

Regarding the question of possible illegal arms exports from Austria, the interior minister promised to take every possible measure to prevent such exports.

CSSR DENIES POLISH-BORN AUSTRIANS TRANSIT VISAS

AU161206 Vienna KURIER in German 16 Dec 80 p 3

[Text] Since Friday, CSSR authorities have been pursuing an unprecedented, arbitrary policy toward Austrian citizens who were born in Poland: at this time, when the Christmas travel season is at its peak, the CSSR Embassy in Vienna denies them any transit visas to Poland. As KURIER has learned from the Austrian Foreign Ministry, the Austrian Embassy in Prague has already been instructed to take appropriate action. So far, the Czechoslovak authorities have refused to comment. The only laconic statement by the CSSR Embassy in Vienna: "Transit visas have been denied only in individual cases, and that is certainly an internal affair of Czechoslovakia."

PAPERS ON HAIG NOMINATION AS SECRETARY OF STATE

HANDELSBLATT Commentary

DW181300 Duesseldorf HANDELSBLATT in German 18 Dec 80 p 2

[Klaus C. Engelen commentary: "Haig Cannot Get Rid of Watergate"]

[Text] By appointing the former NATO Supreme Commander, Gen Alexander Haig, as the new U.S. secretary of state--an appointment which has now become official after weeks of speculation--the newly elected president is provoking the opposition in Congress. In the Senate the Democrats, who were defeated on a broad front in the last elections, will also have to cooperate in the customary approval procedures for cabinet members. Prominent congressional leaders attribute to the dashing general a role of hanger on in the critical days of the Watergate debacle. As the White House chief of staff, however, the man who reached out beyond the Pentagon and was incumbent president of the conglomerate United Technologies Corporation had to answer to the congressional subcommittees, a point which Haig cites in his defense.

Unlike the completely unknown construction contractor, Raymond Donovan, of New Jersey whom Reagan intends to appoint to the cabinet as secretary of labor, the confirmation by Congress for the "Watergate general" will probably not proceed without difficulties.

Ever since the general came under discussion for the important State Department post in the new Republican administration his critics and adversaries have been beating the drums of resistance. The fact that the new U.S. president nevertheless stands behind his favorite, Haig, indicates that Reagan is not afraid of a test of strength with the opposition Democrats in Congress.

Haig, his advocates say, is the best qualified man available for the post of secretary of state at this time. True, Haig need not be ashamed of his qualifications. He was Kissinger's assistant in the National Security Council and then chief of staff in the White House during the critical Watergate days. As the supreme commander of the NATO forces he gained the esteem of the allies. It is not just the friends of the United States but also the Soviet Union and the entire East bloc which are aware of whom they will be dealing with.

FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE Commentary

[Commentary signed Ein: "Persistent and Strong"]

[Text] Alexander Haig is to become secretary of state. This decision by the president-elect is a signal. Ronald Reagan wants to point out the direction of the forthcoming American foreign policy: "clear, persistent, strong." This plausible formula contains the outstanding characteristics of the future State Department chief.

Alexander Haig is taking the foreign policy helm in difficult times. Tension between both world powers has reached a dangerous level. The prestige of the United States has decreased among friend and foe. The State Department itself feels it is without leadership. The present holder of the office considered himself a transition secretary: he was a good senator, but as Secretary of State he was colorless. He was seldom acqainted with details. Muskie and Vance were no match for Brzezinski. In other words, the foreign policy of the Carter government danced back and forth like a shuttle between the White House and the State Department, something which served neither the department nor foreign policy.

So Haig will have to first create order in the apparatus. Then he will make it clear from the very beginning who determines the foreign policy in Washington on behalf of the president. No doubt that this dynamic person will not tolerate any other gods next to him. It will be easier for him than it was for both his Democratic predecessors. The Reagan team has already outlined the competences. The work style has also been outlined. Haig will remain in Washington; Kissinger will not be a model in this respect. Reagan does not like his aides to be continually on the move. He wants them to be at the helm and not in the air. This does not mean, however, that American foreign policy will be static.

One cannot expect miracles however, from Alexander Haig. The setbacks suffered by the country in Carter times can be offset only through presistence. But one can give the new secretary of state credit in one respect right away: The time of illusionist detente policy at any price is over. Congress will still have to confirm him, but Haig has never entered the political arena without being prepared. Since he has accepted the office, there is reason to assume that will endure every aspersion.

TORNADO FUNDS ASSURED, MAJOR PROJECTS NOT AFFECTED

DW190900 Mainz ZDF Television Service in German 1800 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Udo Philipp interview with Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel in Bonn--recorded]

[Text] [Question] You said today that the funds for the Tornado program next year are assured. Does this hold true for subsequent years as well?

[Answer] The budget negotiations for 1982 will commence in the spring of 1981, and at that time it will be necessary to once again procure from the finance minister the funds we need to continue the large procurement projects, including the Tornado.

[Question] To what extent does this Tornado project with its high costs affect other weapons systems, that is, other procurement programs?

[Answer] The only thing we can talk about at this time is the 1981 budget, and under this budget we have made sure that the large-scale procurement projects, especially the Leopard 2 tank, but also other aircraft and the frigates will not be affected by the financing problems of the Tornado. This may be considered all the more definite since the Federal Cabinet has decided to add another DM700 million.

JOURNAL VIEWS ASPECTS OF EAST-WEST INTERDEPENDENCE

DW171220 Hamburg DIE ZEIT in German 19 Dec 80 pp 14, 15

[Wolfgang Hoffmann article: "What Hurts the Soviets"]

[Text] Erwin Schlosser, business manager of the German machine tool producers in Frankfurt, is pessimistic: "I do not think that it will be possible to get the Western countries under one lid. After all, one knows all that is possible in the field of arms exports." And it is true, all experiences to date show this: economic boycotts have been dodged time and again.

Nevertheless, the Western industrial countries are now preparing to punish the Soviets more harshly than heretofore should they go through with what is being feared in the West, namely, the invasion of Poland. Even the French, who so far cared the least about the U.S. demands to help support the American trade embargo after the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, no longer wish to be outsiders now. What is taking shape is that Poland is patching up the brittle alliance in the West.

But it is extremely doubtful whether the patches will hold when put to the test. What is even more doubtful is whether the Western punitive actions will show any effect at all. Otto Wolff von Amerongen, president of the Association of German Industry and Commerce and chairman of the Eastern Committee of the German Economy, in any event advocates the view that a great power like the USSR, which is capable of autarky, will not be influenced in its political decisions by economic considerations. To this day the Soviets have never yielded political concessions when the West threatened economic sanctions or even partially went through with them.

Willy Brandt's thesis that "you cannot punish a world power" is shared even by those in the West which have often voiced criticism against the technology transfer to the Soviet Union. Werner Obst, for example. who prior to his escape to the Federal Republic was an economic expert in the "bureau of the GDR Council of Ministers," believes that the hopes that the Soviet Union might be economically hit with an embargo are much too high. But, Obst also believes, this is not the point that matters. What matters to him is to "accelerate Moscow's economic decline to a rather medium power through the discontinuation of any Western support."

This is feasible, for the Soviet Union is very much dependent on high-quality technical products from the West--much more than becomes evident though a superficial glance at the global figures on mutual trade. The precondition, however, is that the Western industrial countries including Japan pull on the same rope and are prepared, besides, to break existing delivery contracts, short-term and long-term alike. Some examples; the Oberhausen Babcock Company is a traditional supplier of special fittings needed in powerplant construction in general and nuclear powerplant construction in particular. Even though the Soviet Union has embarked on a declared policy of autarky in the energy sector it continues to be dependent on pertinent supplies from the West. Without the Babcock fittings and without any replacement from third countries Moscow would be plunged into a dilemma with its nuclear energy program.

A company specilizing in the manufacture of engines, which are now being produced under license in the Soviet Union and in Czechoslovakia, is fairly sure that the Russians would produce mere scrap if they were cut off from certain supplies such a special alloys or washers whose production in the East in the required precision and quality just does not work even after many years.

And the plastic material factories which Western companies delivered to the Soviet Union in part would have to discontinue producing if they can no longer import the urgently required additives such as so-called softeners, because the West has closed its open doors. Agriculture, which is amply burdened with problems any way, would be plunged into even greater difficulties if the insecticides from the West would no longer arrive.

If the Federal Republic would have waive the new tube-for-natural gas deal the opening of new natural gas fields in the Soviet Union would stagnate, as would the Russian energy supply. For the natural gas with which Moscow plans to pay for the German pipeline is but a part of what is to be opened in Siberia.

If the Western machine building companies have to excerise restraint in the exports of their products to the Soviet Union the economy of the Soviet Union will not idle, to be sure, yet some sectors will be hit hard nevertheless. The German machine-tool companies supply technologically top-level products. Erwin Schlosser: "These are key machines, as we call them, and indispensable for the production of most precise parts."

Some 42 percent of German exports to the Soviet Union consist of machines, electrotechnical products, precision instruments, optical tools, vehicles and ships. The group of mechanical industries exported in 1979 goods of a total value of DM2.7 billion. The volume is likely to increase this year. German exports to the Soviet Union increased by some 20 percent.

The USSR can replace many goods coming from the West; moreoever, Moscow can force the populace to cut down its consumption, but it depends on the supply of top level technology. Although the Soviet Union has developed its economy since the twenties with the help of Western technology, it is as before not in a position to produce significent top-level technology itself. Whether in the field of process control systems, the construction of computers, or the construction of machine tools--there is a technological gap everywhere, the USSR is lagging 5 to 7 years behind the West.

A study of the Munich IFO Institute is interesting. Despite the fact that industrial countries have not maintained restraint with regard to the transfer of top-level technology, the connected Russian "learning processes on the basis of Western technology does not represent a danger with regard to the competition ability of German equipment suppliers." IFO questioned a number of firms, machine and installations constructers, having close business relations with the USSR for years, to what extent the Soviets are able in the meantime to copy Western know-how. The result must not worry anybody in the West: "The taking over of basic technological ideas from foreign installations takes much longer in the USSR than in Western countries; even for copying individual machines at least 5 years were needed. Copying complex installations would take up to 10 years." In the meantime however, the firms of Western industrial countries have improved their technology long ago.

All that proves the economic dependence on the West goes far beyond assumptions based on mere turnover figures in East-West trade. Dependence on specialized supplies would be really felt in case of a total embargo, including the other CEMA countries as well, for otherwise the possibility would exist for Moscow to acquire what it urgently needs through its satellites.

Trade statistics show to what extent the East bloc countries depend on the West: About one-third of the CEMA countries foreign trade is with the West. The Federal Republic is CEMA's greatest world trade partner; it covers about 25 percent of CEMA's trade with the West. Western involvement in East-West trade is rather small. It involves about 4 to 6 percent of the overall foreign trade.

Such an embargo against the Soviet Union including the other CEMA countries, however, means reckoning with countermeasures. The Federal Republic would have to expect to be cut off from Soviet raw materials; for example, some 14 percent of our natural gas comes from the Soviet Union. The degree of dependence is even greater with regard to some other raw materials. The USSR supplies to the Federal Republic some 43 percent of the needed palladium, some 38 percent of enriched uranium, some 27 percent of molybdenum, some 23 percent of ferrochromium and some 17 percent of phosphate. This proves that trade between the blocs is not a one-way street.

LE MONDE ON HAIG APPOINTMENT, REAGAN TEAM

[Editorial: "Mr Reagan's Cabinet"]

[Text] Mr Reagan's future administration gained two new names on Tuesday, 16 December: General Haig will be secretary of state and Raymond Donovan, a New Jersey industrialist, will be secretary of labor. Of course general conclusions should be left until the announcement of nominations for the remaining five posts, of which at least one--energy--will carry political social importance. But some observations can be made now.

The choice of General Haig seems like a gesture of steadfastness in the face of the Democrats and the occasional liberal elements still surviving in Congress, who promised to "seriously contest" his nomination, particularly because of the role played by the former White House chief of staff in the Watergate crisis. But following George Schultz' defection, Mr Reagan had hardly any other alternative solution. The paradox is that a general--the most famous U.S. general since the Vietnam war--will be in charge of diplomacy, while the Pentagon will be headed by an economist, Caspar Weinberger, who apparently does not know much about military matters.

However, they were both chosen for a purpose: Mr Weinberger to control a fast-expanding defense budget and General Haig because of his international experience, gained both alongside Mr Kissinger and in his role as NATO commander in chief. This is the second time that a military man has been appointed secretary of state. His precedecessor was a success: George Marshall, formerly chief of the general staff, held the post from 1947 through 1949, giving his name to the European reconstruction plan on which the old continent's prosperity is based.

In recent years the State Department has played a moderating role in the government team with more or less pacifist liberals such as Messrs Cyrus Vance and Edmund Muskie. General Haig's arrival should reverse this trend. Already known in Europe since his time with NATO, not only as advocate of an increased military effort--that was part of his job--but also as declared adversary of any communist participation in European governments, the future U.S. diplomatic chief has toughened his stances in the past year.

At the Republican convention in July he vigorously criticized the policy pursued in relations with the Eastern bloc, whose two linchpins are detente and security. In his opinion these should be replaced by two new linchpins--reciprocity and strength. He also attacked Mr Carter's doctrine on human rights, and warned Europeans that "the time has gone when they could continually alternately criticize and support the United States, the sole bearer of the burden of their freedom." So the allies have been duly warned, though the general now has the task of rounding off the edges of a doctrine which will become official policy.

The nomination of a cabinet in stages is normal practice for presidents-elect, but these nominations, both tardy and unsurprising, coming as they do after all kinds of leaks revealed the names of the nominees, hardly give the impression of the promised "regeneration." Furthermore, though Mr Reagan has talked about pursuing a "bipartisan" policy, no Democrat has been appointed to a key post. We are still waiting to see a black or a woman in the team. Mr Reagan has implied that this shortcoming will be rectified, but it will give the impression of an imposed decision taken without conviction.

LE MONDE CITES DEBRE ON CANDIDACY, BUREAUCRACY

[Unattributed report on Radio Luxembourge-LE MONDE interview with RPR leadership member Michel Debre on 9 December: "Debre: Chirac Would Be Taking a Grave Responsibility by Dividing the Gaullist Family"]

[Excerpt] "I hope to be present in the second round [of the French presidential election], and I will ask the French people not to vote for my adversary whoever he might be."

Referring to the way in which the institutions function, Mr Debre said: "At present the premier is not a premier. The government is not in a position to exercise its responsibilities in directing public affairs and bringing about an economic recovery. The institutions are distorted. The presidential system is being abused and the president of the republic does not act at the appropriate level. All affairs are referred to the Elysee and Elysee advisers, and the result of that is that the ministers and administrative departments are in a way incapable of making decisions for fear that an order may come at any time to hand over a file for a decision to be made."

The former premier does not advocate reducing the 7-year term of office but he does advocate that "the man who has held this office for 7 years should not be eligible for reelection."

Mr Debre recalled that for 3 years he has not voted for the budget and that, in 1978, he had proposed censuring the government and had called for the formation of a "government of public salvation."

MOBUTU COMMENTS ON FRENCH RESPONSIBILITY IN CHAD

AB181206 Paris AFP in French 1027 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] Paris, 18 Dec (AFP)--France should not have left Chad because it has a certain moral responsibility with regard to the conditions prevailing there now, President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire said on Thursday after an audience with Mr Valery Giscard d'Estaing.

The Zairian head of state, who is on a private visit to Paris, explained that he had not concealed his opinion on this subject from the French president. He said the forthcoming Lagos conference on Chad on 23 December could be positive.

Responding to a question, he stressed that the Libyan intervention in support of the transitional national union government of Chad constitutes the beginning of destabilization in this region. Comparing the situation in Afghanistan with the one in Chad, he underlined: It is the start of destabilization because in Europe, you deplore the Russian occupation of Afghanistan: how can you accept the Libyan occupation of Chad? I am sure it is the same thing.

Mr Mobutu also said that cooperation between France and Zaire was also discussed during the meeting.

The meeting, which lasted 30 minutes, was not on the French head of state's weekly schedule. It was announced only a few minutes before the discussions.

YUGOSLAV PRESIDENT CONCLUDES VISIT; ACCORD NOTED

Greetings From Vatican

LD182246 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 1800 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] Yugoslav President Mijatovic has concluded the official part of his visit to Italy. A report by Bruno Rotelego:

This is one of those cases where correct political comment corresponds--at least after the first reading of the official communiques--to educated and sometimes (?effectively) optimistic words. President Mijatovic's visit was an excellent chapter in the increasingly good Italian-Yugoslav relations. There were also two confirmations: that the exchanges and common initiatives may increase and that there are quite a few things which can be said together in the international field, as regards Mediterranean and East-West relations, such as detente and the prospects of more effective initiatives for disarmament compared with with those which have been made here and there in recent years and in vain. Meeting with Forlani over lunch in the early afternoon, the Yugoslav guests concluded the political party of the visit which started in the Quirinal. Tonight, they will have a meeting with the Yugoslav residents [as heard] in Rome. During the meeting with the premier, who twice visited Yugoslavia when he was foreign minister and who has met Belgrade leaders in other forums, the tone of the talks was most cordial. The main development of the Italian-Yugoslav relations concerns the forthcoming formation of joint enterprises for the [word indistinct] exploitation of the Adriatic which the two countries are committed to clean up and the follow-up of the study concerning Italian credit for Italian exports to Yugoslavia. The officials will determine the amount and the rate of interest.

Tomorrow, after taking leave from Pertini, Mijatovic will have an audience in the Vatican. Tonight, L'OBSERVATORE ROMANO extends greetings to Mijatovic, recalling Tito's visit and audience with Paul VI 9 years ago and observing that the present good relations should also be the basis for good relations between the churches and the state in Yugoslavia.

Statements on Poland, Afghanistan

[Text] Rome, 19 Dec (ANSA)--Yugoslav President Cvijetin Mijatovic winds up a three-day official visit to Italy today and goes to Vatican City to be received by Pope John Paul II.

His three hours of talks yesterday, first at the Quirinal Palace with Head of State Sandro Pertini and then at Villa Madama with Premier Arnaldo Forlani, have confirmed the depth and breadth of Italo-Yugoslav friendship since the signing of the Osimo accords, observers said. Mijatovic, in fact, said that the bilateral ties were 'exemplary.' Pertini saw these ties as a model for Europe and the world as to how two countries divided by tensions in the past, holding to differing regimes and belonging to different alignments could learn to coexist peacefully and thereby contribute to world stability.

In the talks here between Mijatovic, his foreign minister Josip Vrhovec, and Italian leaders, it was clear that the two countries share many of the same views with regard to international problems ranging from Poland to Afghanistan. The Rome talks also served to promote bilateral cooperation.

With regard to Poland it was agreed that no immediate danger was imminent. Both sides voiced the hope that the gains made by the Poles could be consolidated without going beyond certain limits, so as not to endanger detente.

The Yugoslavs emphasized the need for the situation in Poland not to take an anti-Socialist or anti-Soviet turn.

Italian Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo said that the Atlantic alliance was only concerned that Poland was not subject to any external interference, in accordance with the principles declared in Helsinki. Colombo also noted that the financial and economic aid granted to Poland was requested by the Poles themselves.

Pertini and Mijatovic once again condemned the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan.

The two men also dwelled at length on the nonalignment movement. The late Yugoslav Leader Josip Broz Tito was one of the key founders of the movement.

In the talks between Mijatovic and Forlani discussions were enlarged to encompass the problem of stability in the Mediterranean and bilateral economic cooperation.

AUCCTU SECRETARY HEADS DELEGATION ON VISIT

LD181133 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 12 Dec 80 p 16

The Soviet trade union delegation will be in Rome tomorrow for the final meeting of the visit with the CGIL, CISL and UIL International Bureau chiefs.

COLOMBO HAS 'FRUITFUL TALKS' WITH LIBYAN OFFICIAL

LD182343 Rome Domestic Service in Italian 0700 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] The visit by the Libyan Minister [foreign liaison secretary], Ahmad ash-Shahati, who had a long meeting with Foreign Minister Emilio Colombo and Minister of Foreign Trade Enrico Manca, has aroused special interest. This interest is not only due to Italian-Libyan relations but also to the role which Libya plays in the complex Middle East situation and to the equally complex policy of Col al-Qadhdhafi. Al-Qadhdhafi himself may come to Italy within the next few months to return the visit paid to Tripoli 2 years ago by Andreotti who was then prime minister. Colombo and Ash-Shahati discussed several themes: the Mediterranean, Malta, possible participation of Italian industries in some Libyan development projects, oil supplies and the affair concerning several Italians who are still in Libyan prisons on various charges. The final communique states that the meeting was fruitful. Other contacts have been arranged. Minister Manca will shortly go to Tripoli. Ash-Shahati then held a press conference.

BERLINGUER COMMENTS ON PCI'S POLITICAL PROPOSAL

[L'UNITA Editor Alfredo Reichlin interview with PCI Secretary General Enrico Berlinguer: "Our Government Proposal"; date, place not given]

[Text] The political proposal put forward by our Directorate has made a great impression. A heated debate has begun: not for a long time have such well-attended party meetings been witnessed. There is something new in the air and, irrespective of our adversaries' hostile reactions (but even here on is struck by a widespread sense of reflection and caution), doubts and questions are emerging. But what prompted the Communist Party to put itself forward as the lynchpin and rallying point of a broad alignment of forces constituting a real democratic alternative to a DC which no longer seems capable of guaranteeing the political and moral leadership which is such a major, indeed vital, necessity? And why did this intiative occur right now? I believe that people are realizing that the novelty of the proposal lies partly in the fact that it is not the invention of another parliamentary formula or some kind of deception. They realize that our outlook is a new and broader one, that in essence our aim is to tackle the problem of the now necessary change of leadership groups and classes; and that, for this very reason, our proposal is addressed not only to the political forces but to the country as a whole, in order to mobilize it, to organize a mass impetus and current of opinion. But I believe that many uncertainties remain. Is it a realistic proposal? Is it credible? Who are its interlocutors? Are we moving toward a head-on collision with the entire DC and the people's Catholic world? Is the party not in danger of trying to move ahead too quickly and of sectarian reactions? An the question which is being asked so often, sometimes maliciously and sometimes with concern; is it a turning point in our strategy?

This is how I began my lengthy conversation with Enrico Berlinguer, which I have summed up in the following questions and answers:

Reichlin: Let us start with the question everyone is asking you: is it a turning point?

Berlinguer: Arguments over words leave me rather cold because they lead the debate into an abstract area. If we look at the substance of the matter, there is an innovation--and, moreover, a major one, as we shall see in a moment. Nevertheless, it does not constitute a reversal of our strategy. Now more than ever we are proceeding from the idea that to tackle such a grave and dangerous crisis and to defend Italian democracy--and to do so in the only possible ways, namely, by regenerating it--the major people's forces (ranging from our own to the socialist and Catholic forces) must not split or divide but find shared objectives. Specifically, this means that they must not drift away from political life but participate in it personally, with their own historical identity, their own original values and their own political and social organizations. So much for communist extremism and hegemonism. Unity has always been and remains our banner, but it must not be reduced to summit agreements, which are not always possible or opportune. The important thing is that a unitary fabric be maintained at all times. Unity is strong and can survive political ups-and-downs and harsh interparty clashes, irrespective of parliamentary and government stances, if we proceed from this free competition among various forces in the field of the nation's major problems, essentially from the strong collective political experiences of the masses in major battles for freedom and regeneration. Only thus can a people become a nation and identify with the institutions inasmuch as they themselves are involed in defining the nation's goals.

Reichlin: Pardon me for interrupting, but your line of argument leads naturally to the other very much debated issue of the "historical compromise."

Berlinguer: I find all these obituarists of the "historical compromise" rather amusing. Why is it supposed to have failed? It is the caricature of it portrayed as merely a government formula or, worse, as a mere power agreement between the DC and us that has failed. We have said a hundred times that it was not this, but a quest for a convergence among various components of Italian history and national society, and therefore among different classes, which would render a thorough democratic transformation possible, within respect for pluralism and the Republican Constitution. What do our critics want? There are two possibilities: Either they want to prevent this very transformation--well realizing that some form of historical compromise is the only possible method for achieving it--even at the price of a lacerating conflict, or they are hoping that the PCI will stop working for a socialist society based on pluralist democracy, either returning to the idea of the class struggle and the dictatorship of the proletarian or espousing the social democratic outlook. They will be disappointed. Our strategy remains valid in its essential foundations.

Reichlin: I consider this a very important reassertion. It dispels several misunderstandings and reminds us of the heart of the issue, the real reason for our initiative.

Berlinguer: Indeed. The real explanation lies in the novel nature of the situation, that is, in our very concerned analysis of it. Are people aware of how dangerous the country's political and moral crisis has become? And of the reasons why this situation has come about? As far as I can see there are some hypocritites who are railing against us now for allegedly having betrayed our unitary inspiration. This is incredible. Unity with whom? With the people who have led the country into the blind alley it is in now? And, moreover, who did so not accidentally but because they were obsessed with their anxiety not to lose a single crumb of their own power. This is what nullified the major and unselfish attempt which we made after 1976 to involve the DC, ourselves and other democratic forces in a dialogue, a mutual challenge aimed not solely at tackling the emergency but also at starting a change in the state administration, in the role of Parliament and the trade unions, in economic policy and in progressing beyond a democracy which had been rendered lame, short-winded and corrupt by the existence of anticommunist prejudice. Do they now realize the mistake they made?

Reichlin: I too feel that to assess our initiative it is necessary to proceed from the convulsive events of recent years and months. It would be interesting now to look back at how the struggle against us has been waged. The blindness and pettiness of an entire political and cultural approach (ranging from [Industry Minister] Bisaglia to certain socialist currents and a not inconsiderable number of intellectuals) which regarded a force such as ours as unnecessary and irrelevant, having decided that the emergency was over and that major reforms were no longer needed. Classes no longer existed; there was only "social complexity." It was enough, it was claimed, to "float" on the crisis. Planning, the southern issue, the working class' role, the centrality of Parliament and the effort to organize a democracy of the masses were the "scrap iron" of the "obsolete" Marxist culture. It was sufficient to support the spontaneous thrusts of the likes of Brambilla, [allusion unknown] but it was precisely thus that the foundations for the present crisis conditions were laid. Because within this logic the parties were being transformed into mere tools of mediation in a corporative jungle. Politics was reduced to the level of a game, coups de theatre and television messages--with the masses at home.

And so, logically, instead of again challenging the power system as such, people imagined they were competing with the DC on the same ground. Instead of a change of leadership methods and classes, it was an alternation of political personnel that was proposed, on the following basis: make room for me, if only because I am more modern and more determined.

Berlinguer: I agree with recalling these points, because otherwise the very serious erosion of the democratic situation cannot be explained. Otherwise, it appears that it all boils down to the fact that everyone is dishonest. And that we have only just realized it. This is not so. Over the years there has been a dramatic struggle over fundamental political options. The end of the democratic solidarity phase sparked off perverse and dangerous attitudes. Not everybody realized right away that our very harsh attack on the Cossiga government stemmed from our great concern and not from petty and splittist anti-socialist feelings. Something very serious lay behind our conflicts and polemics with the PSI: differing analyses of the Italian situation. It was this that caused the two parties' policies to diverge. Now it is clear that leftwing unity depends on many things, including correct attitudes on our own part, but essentially on how we approach the real problems behind the crisis. I say this because I want people to reflect on the great unitary potential for the entire left embodied in our political proposal; if for no other reason than the awesome reality of the situation with which the left must come to terms if it wants to perform its nonpartisan but national role. And also because we are not merely indicating a political formula but proposing a major social mobilization, a reactivation of intellectual energies and energies within the youth world, the trade unions and the healthy forces of production, science, technology and public administration.

Reichlin: Summing up this combination of ideas, then, it can be said that we have not suddenly altered our strategy. It is the situation which has changed.

Berlinguer: Precisely. None of our initiative can be understood without this. The major innovations of the situation are taken as the starting point. We must face reality squarely. For the first time in 30 years the danger of an institutional crisis, even a collapse of the Republic, has become real. This is what I tell people who ask me the reason for our initiative; it is primarily to prevent such a collapse. I do not want to be alarmist. I do want to say, however, that the process of detachment between the people and the leadership classes has gone so far that unless something new happens--a shape-up or positive turn--the slide toward obscure and rash solutions will become inevitable sooner or later. This is why we have acted.

Reichlin: Were there no other ways?

Berlinguer: What ways? At a time when the DC is giving a clear demonstration of its inability to give the country the slightest political and moral leadership, when its crisis of long standing is degenerating into corruption and phenomena of disintegration and even outright gang warfare, it is no longer enough to demand an end to anticommunist prejudice. In such a situation it is we, together with the healthiest sector of the country, who cannot fail to make preconditions, namely with regard to the moral issue, which extends beyond individuals and must not be regarded as a demand for the banning of the country and of the state apparatus, but which does imply the elimination of its power system.

Reichlin: But is it right to proceed from the moral issue?

Berlinguer: The moral issue has existed for some time. But it has now become the foremost and essential political issue because the restoration of trust in the institutions, the country's real governability and the stability of the democratic system all depend on its solution.

It is a fact, a harsh reality, that if we want to stop Italy from sliding toward the status of a second-or third-rate country, people must be urged to make great efforts and great sacrifices. Has the DC sufficient authority to do this? This, in very simple terms is Italy's political problem now.

How is it to be resolved? By calling for a strong man? By altering the parliamentary nature of the Republic? By asking the C mmunist Party to erode its great and intact political and moral prestige by providing subordinate support for the DC, for the DC as it now is? Generalized mistrust would result. Nor could it be halted if we merely denounced it. This is why I fail to understand some of the objections that have been made regarding our proposal of putting ourselves forward as the driving force and major guarantor of a government uniting all the healthy forces of Italian democracy, honest and capable individuals both from the parties and from outside them--a government of which the DC is no longer the lynchpin and no longer holds the premiership. Nothing could be more correct, from the parliamentary viewpoint, among others. We are the Republic's second largest party and have given demonstrations of responsibility, commitment and impartiality of which everyone is aware: we have democratic and constitutional qualifications of which everyone is aware.

Reichlin: I hear that not everyone--especially among the democratic Catholics--agrees with making the moral issue the central issue, for fewer of a split among people's forces which could benefit obscure forces maneuvering in the shadows, which are no less involved than the DC in corruption and power games.

Berlinguer: For one thing, I would point out that among the masses of believers and in the the Catholic organizations there is a vigorous demand for a reorganization of public life and widespread criticism of the corruption within the DC. Raising the moral issue does not imply splitting the people. It means issuing a political condemnation of an entire power system and mode of government. It is also a political problem of decisive importance. I have already said that it is intimately bound up with the very problem of governability, that is, with the reestablishment of the country's trust in the democratic institutions. By centering attention on this issue we are not only posing the major question of honesty and rectitude in the state bodies and of the parties' morality, but also encouraging the people's involvement, restoring scope for monitoring decision-making and recreating the conditions for real solidarity, without which there can be no hope of emerging from this situation.

Reichlin: This is the very clear lesson of the earthquake.

Berlinguer: Indeed. The ministers have said that this is not the time for polemics, but the time for solidarity in the face of disaster. If this warning was addressed to us, then they chose the wrong target. Indeed, you cannot even compare what the Communists have done and are still doing (we have mobilized thousands and thousands of party members and all our organizations in both northern and southern Italy and have involved the directorate and Central Committee in a major effort of ideas and proposals) with what other parties are doing. And we are doing all this completely unselfishly, seeking unity and brotherhood with all men of good will. At this dramatic time we have also ruled out a government crisis so as not to create vacuums. But evidently the government is demanding something else, which it would be absurd to grant: it does not want us to talk about responsibilities.

The earthquake has shaken the Italian people not only because of the vast scale of the human tragedy but also because it was uncovered the extreme discrepancy between the condition of the state and the country's most basic needs.

The historical responsibilities for the decline and pillaging of the inland areas of southern Italy have reemerged, a new and tragic light has been thrown on the entire southern issue, which the theorists of "modernity" considered shelved forever. I was struck by [former PSI Secretary] De Martino's dramatic words, whose sentiments I share: "Unless there is a change of direction now, it is not only the southern issue, but everything--the entire Italian issue, the country's democratic survival--which will be left unresolved."

I too wonder whether now, after the disaster, people are aware of the problems which the country must tackle to ensure those areas' rebirth and above all of the innovations which will have to be introduced into the entire concept of national development. Because the most serious problem will be not the gathering of resources for the south, but their use--to what end, through which bodies, with what guarantees that there will not be another Belice [quake-damaged Sicilian province] multiplied 100-fold, and with what forms of popular participation and suppression to be used against the corrupt and mafia-style assault on public funds? It has been said that this is a historic opportunity for the south. It is true. But only on the following condition: That this time a real blow be dealt to the old power system. Otherwise, De Martino is right. Humiliation and anger at a failure to rebuild would not be restricted to the south and would cause a fracture in the national fabric. Thus we can see the objective basis of the kind of government which we have proposed.

Reichlin: You mentioned a danger to the institutions. Specifically and in the immediate term, it seems to me that an acceleration of this crisis could be caused by early elections.

Berlinguer: The danger of sliding toward a profound crisis of the institutions is a real one, and indeed such a crisis could also be sparked off by another traumatic break in the legislative term. Whoever sees this danger has a duty to seek the remedies to it and cannot evade a responsible discussion of our proposal.

People must understand the nature of what we would be moving toward in the event of early elections. A combination of conservative and rightwing forces might be tempted to demand a swing in an authoritarian direction--a rash and disastrous response to the problem of governability and the crisis of legitimacy of the system centered on the DC. But other forces might aim for early elections with entirely different aims. For instance, the aim of putting the DC and the PCI on the same level of responsibility--albeit for different reasons--for Italy's ills and thus to assert the centrality of an imaginary third force. This is an irresponsible idea which would create a dangerous vacuum: On the one hand it would split the left and on the other hand it would push the DC to the right.

The path which we are proposing is the safest one also with regard to defending this legislature, since it is the path of uniting the democratic forces around a constructive line. Apart from making the very most of the government potential of a left that has rediscovered the path of cooperation, this proposal would open up great scope for and enhance the role of the intermediary forces, releasing them from ties of subordination to a crisis-ridden DC.

Reichlin: Does this mean that as far as the PCI is concerned the whole of the DC is lost to the cause of moralization and of a new governability?

Berlinguer: This is an issue that must be tackled very responsibly and without demagogic oversimplifications. The DC's crisis or, if we prefer, its decline, is a reality. But it is the crisis of a party which has not only governed for 30 years but which has to a large extent merged with the state.

Therefore, there is an obvious danger of this crisis causing traumas, involving sectors of the state and the machinery and creating dangerous situations. But these dangers cannot be dealt with by bowing our heads and submitting to the survival of its power system. People would lose any alternative reference point, and any possibility of change in the democratic field would disappear. A thorough struggle must be waged against the DC's power system, but in such a way as not to push the entire DC to the right and not to humiliate its best forces, but to open up new opportunities for them--new scope for an initiative of internal regeneration. We have stated in our Directorate's document that the DC is incapable of leading a government which would restore the state's moral health and rebuild its efficiency. This does not mean that we are closing our eyes to the fact that there are still forces within the DC aware, to varying extents, of the serious problem facing the country and seeking, unsuccessfully hitherto, a solution to the collapse of the DC's centrality. I believe that unless these forces managed to profoundly modify their party's approach and conduct, and if they really believe in the need for its reform, they should be willing to agree to a change of government. One of them acknowledged this when he said that the DC will be better able to undergo this cleansing and regenerative treatment outside the government.

Reichlin: Various sides have raised the objection that we allegedly burdened our proposal with hegemonic and even extremist aims.

Berlinguer: Why? There are parties whose popular support is much smaller than ours but which have legitimately proposed a solution to the DC's centrality in the assertion of their own centrality. And in this they have prompted harsh polemics, clashes and tension. Why should we be denied the right (which is now a duty) to put ourselves forward as the driving force and major guarantor of a democratic alternative alignment? We say alternative because quite clearly, alternation within the system and alignment of parties that has governed hitherto is not enough; and we say democratic because we have in mind an alliance extending beyond the leftwing parties.

The left will of course exert its own influence, but there will also be a prominent place for whoever, though not of the left, realizes the need for moralization and intends to commit himself to a major task of regeneration. The important thing is that everyone in practice contribute his own ideas and his own devotion to the Republic.

This is my answer also to what you were saying about the danger of our proposal being regarded in certain areas of the party as a sectarian regression with respect to all the ground we have covered over the years by always defining ourselves as a party open to dialogue, with a profound unitary inspiration ready to shoulder the responsibilities and burdens of a government party in a pluralistic society, inflexible in the antiterrorist struggle and aware of Italy's international position, opportunities and ties. I understand some comrades' feelings but I disagree with certain comments such as "at last," or "you should have realized back in 1976 that we were wasting our time with the DC." We know that we have made some mistakes since withdrawing from the majority in January 1979 and we have examined them and drawn our conclusions. But it must be noted that if a party such as ours, which is not social democratic, can now make a credible government proposal centered on its own strength and on the guarantee which it provides, this is not despite but partly thanks to the experiences of and ground covered in recent years.

PCI'S RUBBI URGES EUROPEAN RESPONSE TO TENSION

[Franco Fabiani dispatch: "WEU debates European Detente and Security"]

[Text] Paris—European security was the main topic of yesterday's WEU session at which the whole day's debate was devoted to strategic balances and the tense situation which currently characterizes international and East-West relations. It is within this context that the assembly considered the "political implications for Europe of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan," hearing and voting on a recommendation from British Laborite Hardy, which several deputies judged "negative" and with which the Italian Communists expressed their disagreement, through proceeding from their well-known stance of condemnation of the Soviet troops' entry into Kabul.

[PCI foreign section chief] Comrade Antonio Rubbi, explaining this disagreement, began by confirming our condemnation but criticized the approach of Hardy's report, which might imply that "everything which now creates tension and insecurity (the emergence of new hotbeds of war, the deterioration in the detente process, the escalation of the arms race and even the Turkish coup d'etat) are simply a result of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan."

Unilateral Analysis

Rubbi pointed out that a more complex analysis of the causes is needed and that U.S. responsibilities must not be overlooked, especially in the exclusion of the USSR from the quest for global framework solutions for the Middle East, the failure to ratify the SALT II treaty and the decision to produce and deploy new nuclear weapons in Europe.

In Rubbi's opinion, "a unilateral analysis of the complex causes of the aggravation of the international situation and of its repercussions in Europe does not help the quest for and indication of appropriate paths to resolving these problems." Nevertheless, Rubbi did not fail to positively underline the conclusion reached by British Laborite Hardy, who admits that "it would be dangerous not to use all favorable circumstances for building peace, because of Afghanistan." This conclusion, however, is contradicted by persistent references to the reprisals policy and to the need for the European governments greater alignment with the United States and by a decidedly distorted view of human rights. Indeed, on the one hand, he is forgetting the coup d'etat in Turkey and on the other hand he clearly reveals that his concern for Poland's troubled affairs—with which we too are concerned—is purely for ulterior motives and for propaganda purposes.

Independent Contributions

"We believe, Rubbi concluded, "that the European governments must take initiatives for detente not in opposition to the United States, but proceeding from the basis of our own interests so as to make an autonomous European contribution."

Comrades Tullio Vecchietti [PCI Directorate member] and Bruno Bertini also echoed this last point, emphasizing the need for European initiatives to encourage all actions likely to check the arms race and to adopt measures for a revision of armaments so as to achieve a form of security based on as low a level of armaments as possible. It is within this framework, Vecchietti said, that "preliminary talks for U.S.-USSR negotiations on Euromissiles must be encouraged, just as the ratification or rapid renegotiation of SALT II must be encouraged."

SOARES ON RETURN TO PS POST, EANES REELECTION

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS Interview

LD181653 Lisbon DIARIO DE NOTICIAS in Portuguese 11 Dec 80 p 3

[Excerpts] "The withdrawal of my support for General Eanes occurred in the way in which I wanted it to occur: not calling the official support of the Socialist Party [PS] into question; nor was I, nor am I, not will I be Eanes' guarantor," Mario Soares told journalists yesterday, shortly after resuming office as PS secretary general. "My silence," Soares added, "meant that I did nothing in support of Eanes' campaign, but did nothing against it, either."

The Socialist leader read out a letter which he had sent to interim PS Secretary General Antonio Macedo, expressing to him his "gratitude and appreciation" for his "efforts to safeguard the party's activity at a time when it has had its difficulties."

"Life is returning to normal," Soares asserted, recalling that according to the PS rules, the secretary general, who is elected at the congress, is not subordinate to any other party body and has a seat on all of them.

In the letter sent to Antonio Macedo, Mario Soares states that "a new and complex stage in Portuguese political life" has begun, and maintains that it is "very clear" that "without a strong and disciplined PS, it is difficult to imagine how democracy can be consolidated, bearing in mind the country's social and economic crisis."

"The party's grassroots, to whom the leaders should perhaps pay greater heed, and the people have appreciated and understood Antonio Macedo's diligent activity for the PS," the secretary general also stated.

Antonio Macedo expressed thanks, asserting that Soares "was absent only physically."

"All Socialists Should Feel Happy"

Although immediately stating that he did not wish to hold a press conference, Mario Soares answered some questions put by the journalists, who wished to know the secretary general's opinion about Sunday's presidential election results.

"The outcome demonstrates essentially that a candidate who appeared in the eyes of the country as the antisystem candidate was defeated, and the man who appeared in the eyes of the country as a candidate of the democratic system was reelected," the Socialist leader said, adding that the President of the Republic gave "three extremely important guarantees": rejection of a referendum for the purpose of revising the Constitution, no acceptance of some amendments to the electoral law aimed at impeding alternation in power and the statement that his second term of office will be "essentially civilian."

"Insofar as the PS supported Ramalho Eanes," Soares maintained, "all Socialists should feel happy."

With respect to his return to office as secretary general and in connection with a question as to whether he was returning "stronger," Mario Soares stated:

"I believe that I am in possession of my full powers, which I have always had since the third congress. I will only account for my term of office to the next congress."

When asked whether he believes that his refusal to support Ramalho Eanes influenced the presidential election results, Mario Soares stated:

"Eanes secured all the votes of the political forces which supported him, and, in addition to a massive leftwing vote, won significant votes from Democratic Alliance voters. This means that the withdrawal of my support occurred in exactly the way that I wanted it to occur: not calling into question the PS' official support; nor was I, nor am I, nor will I be Eanes' guarantor. My silence meant that I did nothing in support of Eanes' campaign, but did nothing against it, either."

LE MATIN Interview

LD181301 Paris LE MATIN in French 13-14 Dec 80 p 9

[Jose Alves interview with Portuguese Socialist party [PS] Secretary General Mario Soares: "Mario Soares Wishes To Prevent 'Portuguese-Style Peronism'"—date and place of interview not specified]

[Text] LE MATIN: Your opponents within the PS accuse you of making a "big mistake" in not supporting General Eanes.

Mario Soares: That is their opinion. For my part, I do not regret my stance at all.

LE MATIN: You are being called to account.

Mario Soares: Only the party congress can call me to account and judge my conduct. We will see at the time of the next congress whether or not I am reelected. If I am reelected, it will be in order to conduct my policy, not other people's.

LE MATIN: The party is emerging strengthened from the presidential election. People have the impression that this strengthening has been achieved despite you.

Mario Soares: I do not believe that the Socialists, especially the grassroots, have that impression. But it is true that the PS is emerging strengthened, since General Eanes' reelection represents defeat for General Soares Carneiro's authoritarian blueprint.

LE MATIN: Do you believe that Eanes' victory could constitute a threat to the PS' identity?

Mario Soares: I do not believe so, to judge by his first press conference after his reelection, when he presented himself as the president of the entire Portuguese people and not of a faction or of a presidential majority. But there may be people in his entourage who harbor illusions and display dangerous aspirations.

LE MATIN: Do you fear that they favor setting up a centrist movement around the head of state?

Mario Soares: The setting up of a "center bloc" would involve destroying the Democratic Alliance (rightwing coalition holding majority in Parliament—LE MATIN note), and I do not believe that it is the president's function to cause the destruction of political parties or coalitions. I hope that General Eanes will not undertake such responsibilities, which would be very grave. The Democratic Alliance should be able to continue to govern, and the PS should remain in opposition. For the moment, the only problem posed is that of replacing Sa Carneiro. It is for the Democratic Alliance to resolve it.

LE MATIN: Is it possible, in your opinion, that the Social Democratic Party might now withdraw from the Democratic Alliance in order to conclude an agreement with the PS?

Mario Soares: In the first place, the foundations of such an agreement will have to be discussed. If it is to materialize, this can only be as a result of discussions between the parties concerned. The head of state should not be involved. He may desire such an outcome, like any other citizen, but, I repeat, his duties do not allow him to assert himself further. Portugal is not Latin America. There can be no Peronism here. The president has been reelected with a comfortable majority, and this gives him great responsibilities. But that is all. We must not return to those governments formed "at the president's initiative" which we have known.

LE MATIN: However, Eanes appears to be the strong man today.

Mario Soares: Under democracy there are no strong men; only leaders who receive their legitimacy from universal suffrage.

LE MATIN: Will you reach agreement with the Democratic Alliance on the revision of the constitution, which requires a two-thirds Parliamentary majority?

Mario Soares: It is possible, on certain aspects. I am in favor of maintaining the semipresidential system. So there is no question of increasing or reducing the head of state's powers. But it will be necessary to clarify relations among the various bodies. I am in favor of a demilitarized system, with the armed forces subordinate to the civil power. It will therefore be necessary for General Eanes to cease to combine the duties of head of state and armed forces chief of general staff and to reduce the prerogatives of the Council of the Revolution, a kind of parallel military government.

LE MATIN: Does your party agree with all these plans? Some people accuse you of behaving like a "Monarch."

Mario Soares: The theory of the monarch comes from France. It is in the French Socialist Party that there is often talk about monarchy; not in Portugal.

LE MATIN: Are you afraid of the emergence of a "Portuguese Rocard"?

Mario Soares: So far nobody has ventured to assume that role here.

BRIEFS

WHEAT EXPORTS TO USSR--In the port of Seville an operation, unequalled up to now in terms of volume, is being carried out to export to the Soviet Union wheat from western Andalusia. One hundred and twenty-eight thousand tons of wheat from the provinces of Seville, Cordoba, Cadiz and Huelva are being exported. At the moment, two Greek cargo ships have already left, the Strofades and the Alexandra, with a great amount of wheat on board. Never has Andalusian wheat been sent to Russia in such large quantities. This purchase by the soviet Union is due, it seems, to the fact that the last wheat harvest was poor. The program of exports of this wheat will mean some 1.75 billion pesetas for the farmers of western Andalusia. [Text] [Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1600 GMT 17 Dec 80 LD]

SCANDINAVIAN LEADERS DISCUSS BALANCED DEVELOPMENT

LD190939 Oslo AFTENPOSTEN in Norwegian 3 Dec 80 p 5

[Throleif Andreassen report: "Regional Leveling in Scandinavia"]

[Text] Future energy and industrial cooperation in Scandinavia could be made easier by harmonizing the regulations for its establishment. The intention must be to achieve a more balanced development between countries and regions within Scandinavia by promoting the transfer of capital from areas of surplus to areas of deficit, Scandinavian Center Party leaders said after concluding a 2-day meeting in Oslo yesterday.

They expressed their great concern over the tension and uncertainty which is characteristic of the international situation. There was broad agreement that renewed attention should be paid to the recommendations of the 1978 UN disarmament session. A desire was expressed for the establishment of nuclear-free zones.

"We ought in principle accept Scandinavia as a nuclear-free zone. Then we would be able to negotiate on the size of the zone," Finnish Foreign Minister Paava Vayrynen said.

Swedish Prime Minister Thorbjorn Falldin stressed that the Scandinavian Governments are agreed that nuclear arms must not be permitted in Scandinavia, but that in the immediate future they must work to achieve guarantees that such arms will not be deployed in the Scandinavian area.

Foreign Minister Vayrynen was extremely cautious in his statements on developments in Poland. "Finland has said that this is a question of internal Polish conditions. However, we hope that the situation will not lead to international complications," Paavo Vayrynen said. The foreign minister also said that Finland was not considering giving Poland any extraordinary support to improve the Poles' economic situation. "We are treating trade with Poland in the same way as we treat all other foreign trade," Vayrynen said. While Prime Minister Falldin announced that the question of economic help for Poland was now being assessed in Sweden.

DEFENSE MINISTER COMMENTS ON ARMY REDUCTION

["CB" report: "The Army Short of 1,000 Men in its Standing Force"]

[Text] The army's standing force is short of 1,000 men in terms of the legislation on defense organization and the present defense agreement.

According to a reply from Defense Minister Poul Sogaard to the Folketing Defense Committee the vacant posts will not be filled because of the unchanged defense budget the government has proposed. There will be cuts in the standing army as early as 1981, if no decisions about a new defense agreement are made. The total so-called covering force which in addition to the standing army includes home-based supplementary forces, will, however, continue to comprise 13,000 men, the defense minister said. Poul Sogaard also announced that the present standing army also includes around 1,050 officers, around 1,260 non-commissioned officers and around 520 privates.

Conservative Defense Committee Chairman Palle Simonsen said in a comment on Poul Sogaard's decision on cuts in the standing army that it gives clear evidence that the government is not living up to the goals of the present defense agreement. The situation will of course become much more serious when the government continues into 1981 with an unchanged budget. "Especially in the tense situation we are witnessing today it is of immense importance that the targets for our standing army are not reduced," Palle Simonsen said.

RIKSDAG DEBATE ON NUCLEAR-FREE ZONE PROPOSALS

LD171703 Stockholm DAGENS NYHETER in Swedish 13 Dec 80 p 2

[Editorial: "For Nuclear-Free Zones"]

[Text] The women's demonstration against nuclear arms planned for Friday evening got off to a false start in the Riksdag interpellation debate on nuclear-free zones. At the present moment there are not that many illusions about detente, but there are signs of growing popular desire to crush the lunacy of rearmament and to halt the buildup of mass-destruction weapons in Europe.

The Riksdag debate provided an example of this, and it did so against a background of the traditional unity on the foundations of Swedish security policy now that disquiet has crept closer to our borders.

What strategy should Sweden choose to try to make itself safe from nuclear arms: In DAGENS NYHETER recently Alva Myrdal reminded us that the UN member nations have actually committed themselves to working for nuclear-free zones. The nuclear powers have also made certain undertakings not to attack nuclear-free zones. It is customary to speak of "negative guarantees." Alva Myrdal prefers to use the term "nuclear protection." Earlier this year she pointed out that step-by-step negotiations have had certain results as far as inhuman weapons were concerned. So why not here too?

What is new about Alva Myrdal's argument is that she abandons earlier attempts to create relatively large nuclear-free zones from the very outset (the Unden plan and Kekkonen plan). Let just Sweden and Finland make a start by trying to get a nuclear protection area set up, she proposes.

In the Riksdag debate Foreign Minister Ola Ullsten, bearing in mind the nuclear powers' attitude, obviously had not really firm expectation that solutions are within our grasp. Other speakers said that they were disappointed that the government was not willing to take any initiatives over and above its attempts at the Madrid security conference to push through a plan for a European disarmament conference. Ullstnm adhered strictly to the demand that from the very beginning Scandinavia and the Baltic must form part of a nuclear-free zone. Norway's governing Labor Party has also begun to promote the same model. It seems to be a condition of both plans that one of the superpowers, the Soviet Union, should withdraw some of its existing nuclear arms intended for deployment in a possible future European theater of war.

Alva Myrdal considers such an attempt to be like trying to make headway through "legally, diplomatically and politically complicated undergrowth." She predicts "wretched delays."

As far as Alva Myrdal's counterproposal is concerned, Ullsten without referring to it directly, made a general comment with the rough gist that a Swedish-Finnish nuclear-free zone would not lead to any results in the countries' immediate vicinity. None of the other speakers took up the argument. One possible reason is that several parties are trying to find a lowest common denominator for the whole of Scandinavia--out of concern that the Scandinavian nations, with their various security policy solutions, are slowly drifting apart.

But it would be a pity if no one began to discuss forcefully and methodically the advantages and disadvantages of Alva Myrdal's argument. Different strategies must be discussed when trying to start a process toward the dream objective--a Europe free from nuclear arms. Friday's interplelation debate means that an obvious opportunity was missed.

SWISSGAS PLANS TO PARTICIPATE IN FRG-USSR GAS DEAL

DW181309 Zurich NEUE ZUERICHER ZEITUNG in German 17 Dec 80 p 9

[Article signed HM.: "The Ruhrgas Company's Deal With The Soviet Union"]

[Excerpts] Bonn, 15 December-While the big international banks haggled these past weeks with the Soviet Union over the conditions and terms of a credit package for financing a 5,000-kilometer pipeline from the Yamal Penisula to the border of Western Europe, the top management of the Ruhrgas Company in Essen is thinking about how the extra natural gas from Siberia should be distributed to consumers in Europe. It is not yet known who will receive the order for the construction of the pipelines and compressor installations. For the time being, the Russian negotiators are playing off the individual suppliers against each other in a masterful way so as to obtain the best delivery and financing terms for themselves. It is fairly sure, in contrast, that the Ruhrgas Company, as the representative of a German consortium and in close cooperation with quite a few European companies, will sign a delivery contract next spring with the Russian Soyuzgas export enterprise for 40 billion cubic meters of natural gas a year. Deliveries are scheduled to commence in 1985; the contract will probably run for about 20 years.

The draft contract with Soyuzgas provides for the delivery of another 12 to 15 billion cubic meters of gas a year to the Federal Republic 5 years from now. Depending on the sales forecast, this doubling of the import quantity will probably increase the shape of Russian gas in the total natural gas comsumption [of the federal republic] to more than 30 percent. Enthusiasm was not the only thing that greeted this prospect among the public, the CDU thinks that a delivery share of more than 20 percent is no longer justifiable.

However, these figures are being relativized in Essen. Natural gas is likely to cover some 18 percent of the German energy supply in 1990. The Russian share in the total energy consumption would thus amount to 6 percent at the most. A small percentage would have to be added for crude oil imports. In view of the distribution of the known reserves in the world, this would correspond to the possibilities of the best possible geographic diversification policy. Some 29 percent of natural gas reserves are located in the Soviet Union, while statistics show that 21 percent are located in the Middle East, 16 percent in Africa and 5 percent in Europe. A total of 66 billion cubic meters of natural gas reserves are supposed to be located in the USSR.

Swissgas representatives confirm that they have been having talks since September with Ruhrgas and Soyuzgas on supplying 0.5 to 1 billion cubic meters of natural gas annually. It reflects the intention to carry on geographic diversification. Non-Western supplies to Switzerland are supposed to be limited to 50 percent in the long run. The Russian import share would amount to about 30 percent; compared with the total Swiss energy supply it would amount to 3 percent.

Swissgas would basically purchase the quantities at market prices from Ruhrgas (plus transport costs from Germany). Swissgas has planned to set up a joint company together with Ruhrgas which would act as negotiating partner vis-a-vis Soyuzgas. Payments to Moscow would naturally take place in sought-after Swiss francs.

The big banks of Switzerland are to be involved in some financing of the pipeline construction. In accordance with the future import share, they are likely to handle a credit of 200 to 500 million Swiss francs. Conditions are still being negotiated at present. The Swiss installations industry was said to have tried relatively late to obtain orders in connection with the building of pipelines from Siberia.

DAILY TELEGRAPH PRAISES REAGAN'S CHOICE OF HAIG

[Editorial: "Reagan's Sensible Choice]

[Text] In nominating retired Gen Haig as his secretary of state, President-elect Reagan has shown praiseworthy coolness. He has refused to back down in front of the artificial sandstorm raised by liberal Democrats about what they will do during confirmation hearings in the Senate. They promise to rake up everything they can to discredit Gen Haig in connection with his former post as assistant to Dr Kissinger and, later, as chief of staff in the White House at the time of Watergate and President Nixon's resignation and subsequent pardon by President Ford. Some of these people must positively regret the absence of Watergate. Gen Haig will survive, since he has nothing serious to hide, but mud will be flung. This will be a pity. It will be totally irrelevant to present foreign policy problems facing the White House.

To these problems, Gen Haig is uniquely qualified to address himself. For the first time for several years there will be a secretary of state in Washington who not only knows a lot about the job through personal experience, but also holds strong convictions about America's role. After such recent holders of the office as Messrs Muskie, Vance or Rogers this will make a welcome change. It may not be too much to hope that Gen Haig will stand comparison with Gen Marshall or Dean Acheson, two great post-war holders of the office who rose above party.

Gen Haig will almost certainly direct his first attention to restoring unity and a sense of purpose to the NATO alliance, which sadly lacks both at present. In this he will have the enthusiastic support of Mrs Thatcher and Lord Carrington. As Lord Carrington's message to him yesterday foreshadowed, the soft spot at the moment is West Germany. The Bonn Government, as its reaction to Afghanistan showed, is suffering from a severely split mind. Gen Haig's five years as NATO supreme commander, during which he won the confidence of all member governments, will stand him in good stead in this vital task.

NORMAL DIPLOMATIC DEALINGS RESUMED WITH UGANDA

[By Tom McMullan, LPA diplomatic correspondent]

[Text] Britain now has resumed normal diplomatic dealings with the new government of President Milton Obote in Uganda, the Foreign Office confirmed in London today. This means formal recognition of the new regime despite criticisms of the election procedure.

A Foreign Office spokesman said that the British high commissioner in Kampala yesterday attended the swearing-in ceremony for President Obote.

The British member of the Commonwealth team which observed the elections, Mr Robin Wainwright, today called on Junior Foreign Office Minister Mr Richard Luce. He told him that the final report of the observer team would be available later this week.

A Foreign Office spokesman said, "We must await the report from the Commonwealth observers group before taking a final view of the conduct of the recent election. We welcome the conclusion in the interim report that the poll was a valid electoral exercise."

ELEVTHERI KIPROS COMMENTS ON HAIG APPOINTMENT

NC190853 Nicosia ELEVTHERI KIPROS in Greek 19 Dec 80 p 3

[From the comment column: "The Selection of Haig"]

[Text] The newly-elected president of the United States, Mr Reagan, has selected General Haig as his country's secretary of state. General Haig is an obstinate man and an expert in laying down military policies, but inexperienced in politics. The new U.S. secretary of state will be assuming a very heavy and difficult task. He may be feeling some security, however, because he realizes that Dr Kissinger's strong presence is by his side. The former all-powerful man of the State Department has already demonstrated his obvious favor for General Haig and, indirectly, his warm support for the selection.

Should we reckon that U.S. foreign policy will be expressed through General Haig's mouth but charted behind the scenes by Dr Kissinger? This is not at all unlikely. Besides, the reaction that has already been manifested on Haig's selection is not irrelevant to the above-mentioned position. The selection of the general as U.S. secretary of state has brought Mr Reagan to his first clash with both the American Democrats and the supporters of detente throughout the world. The followup will certainly be interesting.

DENKTAS DENIES 'BARGAINING' OVER TERRITORY

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, has said that the bargaining over territory in Cyprus can be conducted only when the talks on the essence of the problem begin. Denktas addressed the Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly on the first three rounds of the intercommunal talks at a closed session this morning. According to the Turkish Radio and Television Bureau in Cyprus, the legislative assembly meeting began with a minute of silence in memory of the Turkish consul general in Sydney and his bodyguard who were martyred in an armed assault.

In a statement before the assembly meeting, Denktas pointed out that false rumors have recently been spreading regarding the first three rounds of the intercommunal talks. Noting that he thus viewed it necessary to brief the legislative assembly, Denktas said: There are persons who give the impression that an agreement is about to be reached or territories are about to be handed over. In every statement, I said that these rumors are not correct. If the negotiations on the essence of the talks can begin in the next round, then the give-and-take bargaining can also begin.

Contradicts Kiprianou Statement

[Excerpt] In his statement before the Turkish Cypriot legislative assembly meeting, Rauf Denktas pointed out that with his latest statement Kiprianou had made it clear that he did not want the Cyprus problem to be resolved through the intercommunal talks. Denktas said: There is not one Cypriot people but two national peoples, and a partnership state constituted by these two peoples. Denktas stressed that the point was to harmonize the basic inalienable rights of the two national peoples. Denktas said: That was the aim of the exchange of population carried out in 1975. By saying that an agreement cannot be reached unless all the refugees return to their homes, Mr Kiprianou is trying to eliminate the first basic right of the Turkish Cypriot community, namely the right to exist. Such an approach is completely counter to the summit meetings [presumably between Denktas and Makarios and between Denktas and Kiprianou] and to all the realities of Cyprus. Such an approach cannot lead us to an agreement.

MITSOTAKIS ON SIGNING OF U.S. BASES AGREEMENT

WC181706 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Text] During his conversation with political editors yesterday, Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis stated that it was anticipated that the Greek-U.S. agreement on the bases would be signed by the end of February. The minister added that the Greek counterplan would be handed to the Americans in the next few days. The Greek counterplan will include both the general principles that will govern the agreement as well as the provision for the bases. The foreign minister also denied press reports that the negotiations had implications for the bases. Besides, he stressed, the Americans have accepted that the command of the bases should be entrusted to Greek officers and that there will be a senior U.S. officer in charge of U.S. personnel only.

At any rate, Mitsotakis confirmed that the new agreement on the bases would be based on the agreement initialed in 1976 [as published] and on the U.S.-Turkish agreement. The foreign minister also discussed the bases during his meeting with his U.S. counterpart Muskie in Brussels last week.

The minister stressed that the negotiations on the bases were not in any way linked to the disputes with Turkey over operational control of the Aegean within the framework of the alliance. This question is a purely technical matter and Greece believes it will not be turned into a political issue. Discussions are being conducted at the military level and the issue will require quite some time to be settled.

Finally, irrespective of the discussions on operational control, a moderately optimistic climate was established during last Saturday's meeting in Brussels between Mitsotakis and Turkish Foreign Minister Turkmen. Both ministers decided to meet more frequently, and not only at international conferences. Their next meeting is anticipated for next spring. Concerning Greek-Turkish issues, there is greater optimism over the question of airspace than over the question of the continental shelf.

REVOLUTIONARY GROUP CLAIMS CREDIT FOR ATHENS FIRES

WC190948 Paris AFP in English 0909 GMT 19 Dec 80

[Text] An organisation calling itself the October 80 Revolutionary Group has claimed responsibility for starting huge fires that ravaged two large clothing stores in the centre of Athens overnight, police said today. An anonymous caller claimed responsibility for the fires in a telephone call to the right-wing Athens newspaper MESIMVRINI, police added. The group gave no reason for its action.

There were no immediate reports of victims in the fires but one of the stores, a sportwear shop called Katronzos, was almost completely gutted, police said. The city's entire fire brigade had been called out to fight the blazes and traffic was banned for a distance of several kilometres (miles) around the city's shopping centre.

Greek Premier Yeoryios Rallis went to watch the firefighting in person as did Public Order Minister Dhimitrios Dhavakis, who later announced that the fires were under control.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH POLAND

WC182120 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1900 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] A Greek-Polish agreement on bilateral economic cooperation has been signed at the Coordination Ministry. On the basis of this agreement, emphasis will be placed on trade, industry and technological cooperation. Greek-Polish trade relations are being expanded, and it has been decided that as of 1 January, commercial deals between both countries will be settled in free currency.

EVREN DEPLORES MURDER OF SYDNEY CONSUL GENERAL

NC181210 Paris AFP in English 1301 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Text] Ankara, 18 Dec (AFP)--Head of State Kenan Evren today said he was "deeply disturbed" by the murder in Sydney yesterday of Turkey's Consul General Sarik Ariyak and his bodyguard.

Turkey's biggest selling daily paper, HURRIYET, meanwhile bitterly attacked foreign governments for failing to denounce terrorist attacks against Turks abroad.

General Evren said: "The continuation of these terrible acts of genocide prove that these people (the killers), whose hearts are filled with hatred and anger, have not given up their acts of infamy." (The group which claimed responsbility for the murders, the "Justice Commandos of Armenian Genocide", has been implicated in previous attacks on Turkish diplomats in Europe and the United States.)

General Evren added: "We hope that all the nations in the world who want to create a better and peaceful world share our sorrow. We also await immediate arrests from those concerned agencies and organizations."

HURRIYET said that governments on whose territories such attacks were committed "must try to find out who is hiding behind this terrorism". In a separate article, HURRIYET alleged that the Armenian commandos "are currently organized and encouraged by the Soviet secret service the KGB," and that the Soviet aim was to "annex the eastern Turkish Provinces".

TURKMEN DEPLORES SYDNEY CONSUL'S ASSASSINATION

TA171641 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 17 Dec 80

[Text] Turkish Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen has described as a despicable murder the killing of Turkish Consul General in Sydney Sarik Ariyak and his bodyguard Engin Sever. Foreign Minister Turkmen returned to Ankara today after participating in the NATO ministerial meetings held in Brussels, the Belgian capital. In a statement at Esenboga Airport, Turkmen said that he was convinced that the Australian authorities would do everything possible to apprehend the culprits of the murder.

Further Turkmen Comments

[Text] The assassination of the Turkish Consul General, Sarik Ariyak, and his bodyguard Engin Sever, in Sydney, Australia, has caused a great reaction in Turkey as well as in the rest of the world. Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen held a news conference in Ankara today and referred to this reaction. Expressing his views on the issue, Turkmen said:

[Begin recording] All Foreign Ministry officials have been touched by the reaction of the press in the face of these assassinations. The reaction of our press has an important role in stimulating the necessary repercussions against these inhuman acts in world public opinion. Terrorism is today threatening all world communities. The aspect of terrorism which corrodes communities and endangers democratic regimes is gradually being understood. The UN General Assembly adopted a resolution on the issue. The recent NATO Ministerial Council meeting which I attended issued a separate statement on terrorism. The issue was also taken up at the Council of Europe. The necessity for bilateral and multilateral cooperation against terrorism on an international level is gradually being accepted. We insist that all countries exert every effort to apprehend the culprits who have launched attacks against our representatives. Those who attempt to kill innocent persons should not go unpunished.

Of course, there are two factors involved in finding a solution to this problem. As you have said, we have to increase security measures. However, no matter how security measures are enforced, it is impossible to prevent all these assassinations. In addition, the countries in which our diplomats are stationed should take effective measures. We are exerting continuous efforts in that direction as I have already pointed out. [end recording]

Replying to reporters' questions at the news conference, Turkmen said the following in connection with the meeting he held with Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis during the NATO Ministerial Council meetings in Brussels:

[Begin recording] The issue on which we expect certain developments is the air space issue. We hope that various measures will be taken on the issue in the near future. In addition, talks on the continental shelf issue are continuing. However, it is not possible to say that there is a new rapproachmenet between the views of the two parties. We discussed the issue of Vakfs [religious trusts] with my Greek counterpart. This issue will be taken up by our embassy in Athens and the Greek Government. [end recording]

In reply to a question on the visa requirements certain European countries imposed on Turkish citizens, Turkmen said that after Turkey takes various legal measures the issue will again be taken up with officials from countries requiring the visas in a bid to abolish this requirement.

Replying to a question on economic and military aid being extended to Turkey, Turkmen said:

[Begin recording] As you know, aid is being extended to Turkey within the framework of the OECD. However, we continue to stress this issue in our bilateral contacts as well. I met with U.S. Secretary of State Muskie. The importance of this meeting was the following point. Even though the U.S. administration is changing as of January, the 1982 budget is being prepared by the Carter administration. Therefore, their proposals carry weight. I told Muskie that the funds to be allocated for economic and military aid to Turkey in 1982 have to be sufficient. I referred to the same issue in my meeting with the FRG foreign minister. [end recording]

EVREN COMMENTS ON 'RETURN TO DEMOCRACY' ISSUE

[Text] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has said that he will announce in 1981 the time of transition to a democratic order. General Evren this morning visited the Ankara journalist association and conferred for some time with the leader and administrative council members of the association.

In a statement at the association building, General Evren recalled that recently certain circles were promoting a campaign as to when there would be a return to democracy. Evren said: This campaign has not escaped my attention. They claim that various European organizations have been asking when there will be a return to political life. If they want to force us to make an announcement through outside pressure this can only create an adverse reaction. This distinguished nation decides on its own, not through outside pressures. We have made an announcement. We will say it within a program. Just as the 12 September operation was launched just on time, this issue is also on our mind. I will announce it in 1981. Noting that certain circles have pinned their hopes on outside pressures, Evren continued: There is no need to pin one's hopes on outside pressures. We have repeatedly stated this. The Turkish Armed Forces have never taken a step backward. Especially since Ataturk. Show us an example of such a step. It does not exist. You can not find one.

General Evren said that beliefs that outside aid can be cut through outside pressures were wrong. Evren said: We cannot sell the country's future for money. This nation has learned to be self-sufficient. It accomplished what had to be done by going hungry.

Noting that centers of anarchy and terror have been gradually wiped out since 12 September, General Evren said an atmosphere of tranquillity and security has been created in comparison to the past. He added: If we ask the public now "are you happy with this administration?" and if 80 percent of the population says yes, then what will happen? We have not done this.

VOTCP: COMMUNIST PARTY GREETS CUBAN CONGRESS

TA181148 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 18 Dec 80

[Congratulatory message from the Turkish Communist Party Central Committee to the Second Congress of the Cuban Communist Party [PCC]]

[Excerpt] Dear Comrades: On behalf of all Turkish Communists and toilers and the Central Committee of the Turkish Communist Party [TCP], I extend fraternal struggle greetings to the second congress of the PCC and wish your congress great success. Revolutionary Cuba, which is connected with the land of Lenin--the Soviet Union--and all socialist countries through unbreakable ties, makes valuable contributions to the strengthening of peace and socialism in the world and to the success of peoples' struggle for freedom.

Our people's struggle for national independence, democracy, peace and socialism against U.S. imperialism, NATO and the sovereignty of the collaborationist monopolies has become extraordinarily more difficult under conditions of military dictatorship. The pressures of the military junta, which is pursuing a policy in favor of imperialists and monopolies, are directed against the working class, its organizations and all revolutionary forces. The junta generals have eliminated the limited democratic rights and freedoms in our country.

The gains of the Cuban People in the establishment of socialism and their stand based on the principles of proletarian internationalism constitute a support for the anti-imperialist and antimonopolistic struggle waged by the Turkish working class and our people against all the pressures applied by the junta. The fraternity of struggle between the TCP and the PCC is developing and becoming stronger on the basis of Marxist-Leninist and proletarian internationalist principles.

Long live the second congress of the PCC; long live Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism!
[Signed] TCP Central Committee Secretary General Bilen.
[Dated] 17 December 1980.

GOVERNMENT TO TRY FOR 3 PERCENT DEFENSE INCREASE

[Excerpt] Bonn, 19 Dec (DPA)--According to Government Spokesman Becker, the Federal Government will continue to try to meet NATO's agreed objective of a 3 percent net increase in its defense budget. Becker, who was speaking at a press conference in Bonn, made this statement in response to the sharp criticism leveled by the outgoing U.S. secretary of defense, Harold Brown, who described the 2.2 percent increase in defense expenditure envisaged in the Federal Government's 1981 budget as a "grave disappointment."

Becker declined to make any fresh statements on this matter. He pointed out, however, that the Federal Republic was doing well in comparison with the other European NATO partners. In reply to a question, Becker intimated that a 3 percent increase in the Bundeswehr budget might be reached at the end of next year, but this could not be predicted. The possibility of a supplementary budget for defense expenditures had "not been considered" during the cabinet discussions on the budget.

APEL SEES BUNDESWEHR FACING FINANCIAL PROBLEMS

LD212054 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 21 Dec 80

[Text] Defense Minister Apel sees the Bundeswehr faced with great financial problems in the future. In a Deutschlandfunk interview today he said that the time of surpluses is over everywhere. There is no need to dispense with weapons systems which have already been ordered, but trends which were followed in the past cannot be followed in the future. Apel said that it will not be possible to finance the tactical combat aircraft of the nineties. There are also great problems regarding plans to build a French-German battle tank. He described developments with regard to manpower as giving rise to concern. Age groups which are marked by a low birthrate will bring great difficulties, and so in the next 5 to 6 years it will be necessary to discuss lengthening the period of military service. Apel also spoke in favor of women serving in the Bundeswehr, but not that they should use weapons.

Tornado Financing Assured

[Excerpt] Bonn, 21 Dec (DPA)--The financing of all major weapon systems ordered for the Bundeswehr is assured in the 1981 state budget, according to Federal Defense Minister Hans Apel (SPD). In an interview for Deutschlandfunk the minister said on Sunday that this also applies to the "Tornado" multipurpose combat aircraft.

Apel announced a "closed conference on arms and finance" for March 1981 which will establish all acquisition systems and financial requirements in the defense sector. He underlined that all industrial nations of the Western world have reached a financial turning point which will also leave its mark on defense budgets.

BRANDT INTERVIEWED ON POLAND, EAST-WEST TIES

DW191013 Frankfurt FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU in German 19 Dec 80 p 5

[Correspondent Harry Schleicher interview with SPD Chairman Willy Brandt; date, place not given]

[Text] FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU (FR): Mr Brandt, against the background of developments in Poland and Afghanistan is there still a chance that detente policy will survive in the eighties, a policy you were quite involved with forming?

Brandt: Afghanistan and Poland are two completely different issues, bringing completely different influences to bear on international developments. I would not like to view Poland in this connection, although it is frequently done. Poland has much more to do with Poland than with East-West relations.

Relations between both world powers are the crux of the matter for me. We assumed 10 years ago--and this pertains not only to me--that political and economic cooperation should be developed in such a way that ever better prerequisites would be achieved for the discussion of military and security problems. The actual negative aspect of the seventies was the fact that while matters have not developed so badly with regard to the first issue, almost nothing has happened in the armament field.

That makes me believe--regardless of how one interprets detente, let us call it as normal a cooperation as possible between different systems--that detente will not survive the coming years if nothing happens in the armament field, particularly in the arms control and arms limitation fields.

FR: You differentiate between Poland and Afghanistan, and yet developments in Poland have brought considerable influence to bear on relations between the world powers. What do you think, as a politician given to careful arguments, of sanctions conceived in advance in case of an emergency in Poland?

Brandt: Many things have been voiced which were not official policy at all. Some people in the West are running the risk again of making preparations for the wrong marriage or the wrong burial. The so-called Polish emergency is for me still the least likely case. Polish developments will remain difficult, although the last few days particularly have shown that the desire for national consensus is playing a strong part.

FR: Do you assess the army's approach as positive?

Brandt: I do not know the Polish Army from the inside, but everything indicates that the army leadership feels a national responsibility. This means that it wants to cope with all dangers, dangers which are being discussed too one-sidely in our country as being external dangers; if need be, the army would take over a higher degree of responsibility. But to come back to the actual question: Nobody--at least I did not--maintained in connection with detente policy that guarantee certificates would be issued saying that no internal changes would take place in any of the European states involved. That would contradict every historical fact. Nothing ever just stops anywhere. This was not Helsinki's intention. For me at least it is not surprising that ruling communism will not remain the same foreover and that developments will also take place in states with that system. Many people do not take that into consideration. They just see the factor which would result from the Soviet Union's occupation of Poland--I will leave out the palliative word intervention. The Soviet leadership would be out of its mind if it seriously considered an occupation of Poland. I do not believe that it is out of its mind. It knows history. It knows about the special role played by national awareness in Polish history. It knows the supply problems which would not be improved by occupying the country and bearing responsibility in a different way than as a partner of the country, regardless of what kind of a partner. And it knows particularly about the devastating effect such a measure would have. I still consider this as most unlikely.

FR: Are other "intervention forms" possible?

Brandt: They are possible and maybe under way already in the form of stronger emphasis on rights of passage which the Soviets have by treaty. The speeches held in some places and the catalogues of measures which are being set up do not fit such situations, such gray zones.

FR: Are you in favor of a catalogue containing gradual measures with regard to the quite different developments that might occur?

Brandt: One ought mainly to take care of the things involving Poland itself. Loud advice from outside will cause only disadvantages for the Poles and give no advantages. We must try to achieve understanding. The European Community will make a considerable contribution. I see it this way, if the thing many people talk about does not happen....

FR: You mean intervention?

Brandt: ...Even if a high degree of national responsibility stands the test, as demonstrated in Gdansk, a critical supply situation will occur in the spring if no help is given. When the Gdansk agreement was reached, I failed to see how the Polish Government could fulfill its material promises. Since it knows that it will get a few things from the European Community, it can clear some storage facilities in order to have some goods to offer the people at Christmas. That could help to tone down the crisis that can be forecast for the spring.

FR: Did Western reactions possible contribute to the curtailment of Polish reform intenions, thus stabilizing the situation in the way the Soviet Union would accept?

Brandt: The continuous hinting at great dangers has certainly not done any harm. It demonstrated to the Poles that they are a very important state in Europe, very important for all future cooperation, let alone security systems. Verbal excesses have not helped and cannot help, excesses which are not covered by any feasible real future policy. I was recently under the impression in Washington of having met an orgy of impotence in some places--I do not think much of that. I was surprised in recent weeks--and Moscow certainly has not ignored it either--that leading representatives of the Third World watch developments in and around Poland with even more interest than was the case in Afghanistan.

FR: Do you believe in view of the historical developments of 1953, 1965, 1968 and 1970 and in view of current developments in Poland that "real socialism" can be reformed?

Brandt: That is very hard to say and therefore hard to substantiate. I do not believe that everything will remain as it is in the world. Only people who have never read Marx or Hegel could believe that. The historical examples you have named all have to do with crises that were quite different in substance. Poland already held a special position, a position that was incompatible with a strict approach to a communist one-party rule.

I never agreed with those who said that anything other than the usual relations between the Communist Party and the trade union could never develop. It is a wrong interpretation to say that according to the Communist doctrine, the trade unions must be mere transmission belts for the party. At least Lenin did not mean that. This is applicable only where one has misinterpreted Lenin. Lenin wrote in the last year of his life, I believe, that trade unions cannot live up to their role if they are mere transmission. The thesis of unchangingness would lead to a fatalistic conclusion I cannot accept.

FR: What should the Western leftist democratic movements do--exercise circumspectedness or demonstrate active solidarity?

Brandt: I do not want us in the West to be valiant instead of others. It represents a poor division of labor if people in Poland have to face the music while we are using strong words. To be more specific: If the U.S. trade union lets "Solidarity" have $25,000, I cannot criticize this at all considering my principles and my attitude. But one may well doubt whether this is reasonable. The people organizing new trade unions over there are facing an aggravation in their serious struggle if they receive an offer from the United States, of all places, which does not yield much weight materially, but which nevertheless provides others with the pretext for sticking a label on them which they do not deserve and which they do not want.

In Europe this looks a bit different indeed. I have advised my friends in the trade unions who have asked me to keep in mind that unrequested, rash, or any form of solidarity will not be of any help, no matter how well meant it may be. At the moment moral support is worth much more. De facto support, which I advocated in the European Community, is sensible. The debate in Poland, within the party, between parts of the reforming party and others, will be burdened rather than promoted if the label of foreign interference can be stuck on it.

FR: Was your decision not to support Lech Walesa's nomination for the Nobel Peace Prize attributable to this line?

Brandt: No, not at all, I have immense respect for this man from among the people, this natural talent. What this involved was a decision I made a year after the prize was awarded to me, namely not to make any recommendations as otherwise I would have been utterly embarrassed. This has nothing to do with lack of respect for the man you mentioned.

FR: Do you think "Solidarity" and Walesa showed responsibility with regard to realpolitik?

Brandt: I do not wish to give any marks. But I am amazed indeed by the degree of responsibility with which they are making their remarks. Some people from the spontaneous workers movement still have to learn about interrelations. But they know where Poland is located and where other countries are located. What will work and what will not is clearly audible from what they are saying.

FR: Noted Soviet politicians advocate the thesis that to some Western politicians in general and American politicians in particular Poland is a mere alibi for their intention to "arm" the Soviet Union "to death." What do you think?

Brandt: I think this is a misinterpretation. This takes me back to my initial thesis that the one thing that proceeded differently from the way one would have wished is the unsatisfactory relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union. Essentially this is attributable to the fact that the minimum of confidence failed to develop without which nothing can be attained in the armaments field. It is my view that this problem would be in exactly the same state if the Polish development had not occurred. What I cannot totally rule out, however, though I would deeply regret it, would be a disastrous development related to Poland, which would entail an even more drastic worsening, another turn of the arms spiral, which probably will come anyway.

FR: Has this dreaded escalation of the arms race been programmed in advance by new U.S. President Reagan?

Brandt: We will have to wait and see. Surely it is true that some presidential advisers proceed from the thesis that the Soviet Union could be armed to death or at least shown that they can do a lot more than the Soviet Union. I have always been convinced that the United States can do quite a lot. Still, I consider this thesis highly questionable.

FR: Does Haig's appointment spell a "militarization" of U.S. foreign policy?

Brandt: Not necessarily. There will be a strong inclination toward what the Americans refer to as "linkage," which can also be translated to stand for the desire to discuss imminent questions in the world in a certain interconnection. I consider this legitimate. For the sake of all of us I deem it urgently desirable that those talking on behalf of the two world powers achieve concrete results such as another treaty on strategic weapons, if they can do it, but that they also talk on Eurostrategic weapons. At the same time, however, they should talk about developments in various parts of the globe where they are in a conflict with each other or may be plunged into one. The question is how to do it.

FR: What consequences will all this have for Europe, especially for the dual decision of NATO on Eurostrategic weapons?

Brandt: This depends on how deep the frost goes, how far down the thermometer will drop. As skeptical as I am with regard to overall developments between the two great powers, I am not as pessimistic where strategic weapons are concerned. The two world powers behave as if SALT II, the second treaty on the intercontinental annihilation machines, were in force. The effects on Europe, that is to say, on the Eurostrategic weapons, must be viewed rather pessimistically. From the very outset the Brussels dual decision has always been interpreted in the United States slightly differently than by many people in Europe. To many people in Europe the two elements stand side by side with equal weight: making preparations for the reinforcement--or arms gap closure, as some people say--but at the same time negotiating with the potential objective of still changing this, if not making if superfluous, and then tone it down in its effects. This, however, would be possible only if the Russians on their part do something as well. We have been told that at best 3 to 4 years are available for negotiations. One year has passed already; we might as well deduct another 6 months until the new U.S. administration is properly working. The probability increases that the leeway for negotiations will not only be shortened, but also otherwise narrowed down and that making preparations for the closure of the arms gap gains in weight. In short, time is almost running out, and as a result the probability increases that the decision will take effect. But perhaps something might still start moving in 1981 and 1982, but not later than that.

FR: A question concerning the outgoing year: Will 1981 be better or worse than 1980 as far as the world situation and East-West relations are concerned?

Brandt: You are not asking me about my hopes. My anticipation, unfortunately, is that 1981 will be a particularly difficult year for East-West relations. This will not be helped even by the fact that the North-South relations will be very difficult despite some beginnings of solutions.

PRESS DISCUSSES GENSCHER VISIT TO PRAGUE

[Press review on Foreign Minister Genscher's Prague visit]

[Excerpt] FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU writes: In difficult times it is of particularly special value not to disrupt East-West talks. It was demonstrated in Prague how much both sides try to explain their positions which are chained to the respective alliances. Even if this visit, like others before it, had no effect on calming down the situation in Europe, the frank talks were a significant contribution to a better assessment of the Western and Eastern positions. An erroneous assessment of Western reaction in case of a repeated Afghanistan should not take place this time in Europe.

The daily DIE WELT notes: If politicians in the East and in the West term their talks as constructive and useful, it can mean much, it can mean everything--but also nothing. Important are not the well-formed words but the contents. So the German side commented on Federal Foreign Minister Genscher's visit to Prague with friendly words, while the CSSR side used almost exuberant ones. Assuming that the people in power in Prague are closely linked with Moscow, one must ask oneself the following: What did Moscow intend by giving its blessings to this meeting right now? Is this to demonstrate the divisibility of detente by having Prague and East Berlin play different roles vis-a-vis Bonn?

NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG states: Hans-Dietrich Genscher has hardly ever received so much unexpected praise from the host after a visit to the East bloc as in the CSSR. Such an improvement in the climate in East-West relations is a ray of hope. But it would be an illusion to believe that Hans-Dietrich Genscher with his clear warnings has achieved a sudden change of Prague's position vis-a-vis Poland. There is a clear intention behind the benevolent attitude: The West is supposed to be calmed down, its fears to be scattered. Prague and thus also Moscow do not want to burn all bridges because they urgently need economic cooperation with the West due to increasing shortfalls.

SFRY PRESIDENT MIJATOVIC CONCLUDES STATE VISIT

[Text] Rome, 19 Dec (ANSA)--Yugoslav President Cvijetin Mijatovic's 3-day state visit to Italy came to a formal (?end) here this morning in a long and moving embrace with his Italian counterpart Sandro Pertini.

Mijatovic, whose visit to Italy this week was the first visit abroad by a Yugoslav head of state since the death of Josip Broz Tito, voiced pleasure about the welcome he received in this country and the importance attached to the event.

Pertini said he was glad to see that the new Belgrade leadership was "dynamically" pursuing Tito's policies. The visit confirmed the strong ties of friendship binding Italy and Yugoslavia and laid the groundwork for a further improvement of bilateral economic ties.

Meeting With Pope

LD192030 Vatican City in English to Central and West Europe 1445 GMT 19 Dec 80

[Text] The Holy See's willingness to develop and consolidate increasingly fruitful relations with Yugoslavia was reaffirmed this morning by John Paul II in the discourse he addressed to the president of the Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia, Mr Cvijetin Mijatovic, who arrived in the Vatican on an official visit at 1100. The pope began by recalling his previous meeting with his distinguished guest, who attended the inaugural ceremony of his Pontificate as Yugoslavia's representative. He also mentioned the contacts which had taken place between both parties in recent years, especially recalling the meeting between President Tito and Pope Paul VI, a meeting, he said, which marked an important stage in the strengthening of more fruitful relations between the Holy See and Yugoslavia as well as in the (?fight) for loyal relations between church and state. Such relations, the holy father stressed, if they were founded on respect for reciprocal independence and the rights of each, cannot fail to be advantageous both (?for civil) society and for the church.

Declaring that today's visit by the Yugoslav president is a sign of the determination to continue the process began by the meeting between President Tito and Paul VI, the pope said he was well aware of the positive results which might subsequently be achieved thanks to the joint efforts of men who, inspired by good will, examine together the various problems with a view to finding adequate solutions to them.

At this point, John Paul II recalled that it was just with the view to a particular action in favor of peace that he had last September sent the document on freedom of conscience and of religion, accompanied by a pastoral letter, to all the heads of state of those countries which had signed the Helsinki Final Act, in view of the Madrid review Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Your reply, the pope told the Yugoslav president, shows that you personally and the government of your country have understood the positive intention of this document, which aims at ensuring that each human being may appropriately satisfy his own most intimate spiritual aspirations, both at the individual and community level and also find encouragement in more favorable conditions committing his own contributions serenely for the achievement of the greatest social wellbeing of all.

The pope added that the document in question may also have beneficial effects for the life and activity of the Catholic Church in Yugoslavia, to enable her better to fulfill her religious and moral mission. Progress in this direction, John Paul II emphasized, would not fail to foster the contribution made by Yugoslav Catholics to the improvement and consolidation of their country's social life.

After pointing out the deep appreciation felt by the Holy See for all measures and efforts aimed at surmounting the tensions and dissensions which increasingly perplex the co-existence of men and nations today, the pope praised the efforts being continually made by Yugoslavia within the various international organizations to prepare ways which may permit a solution to the great difficulties which still make peace in the world a (?problem today). In conclusion, the holy father extended his best wishes for the new year both to the president himself and to all the peoples of Yugoslavia and to the federal and local authorities, with the hope that 1981 (?brings Yugoslavia the joy) of constant [words indistinct] both their material and spiritual aspirations. The pope [words indistinct] to all those who are preparing to celebrate the birth of our Lord in Yugoslavia.

In his official visit to John Paul II, the Yugoslav president, Cvijetin Mijatovic, was accompanied by the federal secretary for foreign affairs, Josip Vrhovec, and various other government representatives. The private meeting between the Yugoslav president and the holy father took place in the pope's library. At its conclusion, the presidential suite and leading ecclesiastical dignatories were introduced. This was followed by the pope's discourse and then the exchange of gifts. On taking his leave of the pope, the Yugoslav president made a courtesy call on Cardinal Secretary of State Casaroli. At the end of his visit to the Vatican the Yugoslav president [words indistinct] returned to the Grand Hotel where Cardinal Casaroli, accompanied by the under secretary of state, shortly afterwards went to return the Yugoslav president's visit.

LIBYAN OFFICIAL ENDS WORK VISIT, LEAVES FOR HOME

[Text] Rome, 19 Dec (ANSA)--Libyan Minister for Foreign Relations Ahmad ash-Shahati left Rome for Tripoli today at the end of a five-day work visit to Italy. In Rome, Ash-Shahati had talks with Foreign Affairs Minister Emilio Colombo, Minister of the Interior Virginio Rognoni and Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca. He also had a series of meetings with other Italian political leaders.

Priot to his departure, the Libyan described his visit as "fruitful". He also said that the trip had enabled him to convey the Libyan people's solidarity and condolences to the Italian victims of the earthquake. Asked about the possibilities [words indistinct] Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi might make a visit to Italy, Ash-Shahati said that such a trip would crown encounters at a ministerial level between the two countries (?which will continue) next month when Manca goes to Libya.

It was too soon to set a date for the Al-Qadhdhafi visit, the Libyan minister said, but added that if things go well, Al-Qadhdhafi would soon be meeting with Italian Head of State Sandro Pertini.

SAUDI FOREIGN MINISTER AL-FAYSAL ARRIVES FOR VISIT

AU191657 Rome ANSA in English 1530 GMT 19 Dec 80

[Excerpt] Rome, 19 Dec (ANSA)--Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal met with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo shortly after arriving in Rome this morning. The visiting diplomat was met at Rome's Ciampino Airport by Colombo, Saudi Arabian Ambassador at-Turki, Italian Ambassador Solera, Protocol Chief Marcello Guidi and the ambassadors of several Arab countries stationed in the Italian capital.

Sa'ud al-Faysal will pay a call on Italian President Sandro Pertini late this afternoon and is scheduled to meet with Premier Arnaldo Forlani tomorrow morning. The visit is expected to be riveted on an intense array of political and economic issues.

Meeting With Colombo

LD200217 Rome in English to North America 0100 GMT 20 Dec 80

[Excerpt] Closer ties between Italy and Saudi Arabia in striving for peace in the Middle East and the maintaining of the present balance in the Mediterranean and the Gulf were called for by Italy's Foreign Minister Colombo and Saudi Arabia's [word indistinct] Al-Faysal during their long talks that took place on the first day of the prince's visit to Rome.

On referring to the Middle East, Al-Faysal said that Saudi Arabia considers the imposing of the Camp David negotiations to be outdated and that, consequently, executive international resolutions should be strived for with European countries and the United States taking part, though not the Soviet Union. In the Saudi minister's opinion, Moscow has no interest in attempting to find a solution. Rather, it wishes to leave everything up in the air. Al-Faysal called on the European states to consider the Palestine Liberation Organization, the PLO, to be the sole representative of the Palestinians. Colombo and Al-Faysal then expressed their concern over the war between Iraq and Iran, which was preventing a political solution from being found in the foreseeable future.

More on Talks

[Text] Rome, 20 Dec (ANSA)--Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister Prince Sa'ud al-Faysal moves into his second day of an official visit here today with a meeting with Italian Prime Minister Arnaldo Forlani. Sa'ud arrived in Rome Friday and had a total of five hours of talks with his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo and met with Head of State Sandro Pertini and Foreign Trade Minister Enrico Manca.

The Sa'ud-Colombo talks took place in atmosphere described as "very friendly, concrete and constructive". The visiting diplomat chief said that Italo-Saudi relations must be strengthened and that it is "necessary to relaunch, develop and widen the fields of bilateral cooperation". The Middle East issue dominated the first part of Prince Sa'ud's talks with Colombo. The ministers decided to begin their talks with political problems, even if economic relations between their two nations are of vital importance--Saudi Arabia supplies Italy with one-fifth of its oil and provides a market for many Italian firms, with currently more than sixteen thousand Italians working in the Middle Eastern nation.

Speaking of the Israeli-Arab conflict, the Saudi minister said that that the Camp David agreements are a complete "failure" and added that international resolutions which force the parties to implement them must be found. Each of these solutions, he said, "must be just and lasting and must include the effective and essential participation of the West and the United States" because these countries have "historical responsibilities and also interests" in the Middle East. The case of the Soviet Union is different, Sa'ud al-Faysal said, because "it shares responsibilities but does not have interests" in solving the issue.

The Saudi diplomatic chief's view that it is not a question of relaunching the Camp David agreement but of finding new solutions was echoed by Colombo who said that a European initiative "will not be a continuation of Camp David, but will have its own identity and autonomy. What we do not want", he added, "is that it be juxtaposed to the Camp David accords", in that it is not an alternative but a next step. Despite all their limitations, the Camp David agreements, according to Colombo, also had positive effects--they indicated in particular that the peace process in the Middle East cannot produce results without the participation of the West.

The Italian foreign minister also explained the decisions of the last European Economic Community summit in Luxembourg (which Al-Faysal said he did not clearly understand) and said that the EEC Nine agreed to identify "areas, even if limited, of possible rapprochment among their respective positions", i.e., self-determination of the Palestinians, Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories, security for the states in the region and the Jerusalem question. Colombo later described the Saudi leadership's policies as "far-reaching" and voiced appreciation for Sa'ud al-Faysal's "incisive stimulus" to Saudi Arabia's activities on the world political scene.

The Italian foreign minister reiterated that Italy has always been in favor of a "comprehensive solution" of the Middle Eastern problem to whose success the Saudi contribution of "balance and realism" is precious. Colombo also spoke of the Iran-Iraq conflict and voiced the hope that the Saudi Government succeeds in mediating the dispute and restoring Arab solidarity which is also "the premise for a fruitful dialogue with the West in view of an articulated combination of joint resources and potential".

In his reply, the Saudi prince voiced "satisfaction for the degree of development reached in Italo-Saudi relations based on friendship, cooperation and mutual respect. ...There is no doubt that our relations are moving towards a further development based on mutual understanding with respect to the situation in our respective countries".

With respect to Italo-Saudi economic cooperation, Sa'ud al-Faysal said that his country "welcomes the participation of Italian firms in the nation's development plans". He also stressed on the political plane "the essential and very important role Italy plays for security and stability in the Mediterranean, not only because of its geographical position but also because of its enourmous human, industrial and advanced technological resources". The Saudi foreign minister condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and voiced the hope that the Iran-Iraq conflict can be resolved through negotiations.

In his meeting with Sandro Pertini Friday, Sa'ud and the Italian president reviewed all recent developments in bilateral relations and discussed the situation in the Middle East. The Saudi prince also voiced the solidarity of the Saudi people and of King Khalid 'Abd al-Aziz with the Italian people after the killer earthquake which devastated the Italian south, and announced that his country would make a contribution for the relief effort.

ALLIANCE LEADERS ACCEPT BALSEMAO AS PRIME MINISTER

[Excerpts] The second summit meeting of the Democratic Alliance was held at the Lisbon headquarters of the Social Democratic Party [PSD] today. Present at the summit were Pinto Balsemao, Freitas do Amaral and Ribeiro Telles, leaders of the PSD, the CDS [Social Democratic Center Party] and the PPM [People's Monarchist Party] respectively; the three parties which make up the present parliamentary majority and the ruling coalition.

Speaking to reporters at the end of the meeting, Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida of the PSD said:

[Begin recording] Today, more than ever, the Democratic Alliance is sound and united in its resolve to meet the aspirations and needs of the Portuguese people. By virtue of the freely expressed will of the electorate, the Democratic Alliance has the right and the duty to govern during the next 4 years, and it will assume in full and without reservations this responsibility. The delegations of the PSD, the CDS and the PPM today reaffirmed their respective parties' acceptance of Dr Francisco Pinto Balsemao as prime minister of the next government. The three parties agree to participate actively in the future cabinet and to lend it clear and public support inside and outside the Assembly of the Republic. The PSD, the CDS and the PPM also agree that the structure and composition of the next government must ensure that it will be a strong and long lasting one. [end recording]

At the summit, the Democratic Alliance upheld the view that institutional cooperation among the various organs of sovereignty, namely, between the president of the republic and the government, is desirable and should be put into practice. Leonardo Ribeiro de Almeida also spoke about the Alliance's stand vis-a-vis the president of the republic.

[Begin recording] The delegations of the PSD, the CDS and the PPM reaffirm that the parliamentary majority of the Democratic Alliance, which emerged from the 5 October legislative elections and which will exist for 4 years, was not affected by the outcome of the 7 December presidential elections, as this is something which arises from the constitution and is recognized by all democratic forces. It behooves the Assembly of the Republic to legislate and the government to govern.

The Democratic Alliance will not, under any circumstances and before anybody, relinquish its own blueprint or the constitutional rights which fall to it as [parliamentary] majority and as government. [end recording]

With regard to the revision of the constitution, which the Alliance regards as a political and democratic task of utmost national importance, the communique released after the meeting announces the ruling coalition's intention to put forward a draft of its own next January. The Democratic Alliance further expressed its wish to reach an understanding on the revision of the constitution with the democratic opposition parties, namely, with the Socialist Party, as it has always stated.

At the beginning of the meeting, the Democratic Alliance paid tribute to Sa Carneiro and Amaro da Costa and took the view that the best way to honor the memory of the deceased leaders is to carry on with the work which they started and to remain loyal to the spirit with which they imbued it, with the greatest cohesion, resolve and effectiveness at the service of Portugal and all the Portuguese people.

GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATES RESPONSIBILITY FOR FIRES

NC191139 Athens Domestic Service in Greek 1100 GMT 19 Dec 80

[Text] Prime Minister Rallis delegated the coordination of activities for dealing with the problems that have resulted from the destruction of the Minion and Katrantzos Spor stores to Commerce Minister Kalantzakos and National Bank Deputy Governor Tzanetakis. Mr Rallis has given specific instructions for dealing with problems that refer not only to the damages suffered by the two firms but mainly to the issues that concern the people who were employed by the two firms. In the meantime, the fire that broke out at dawn today at the two stores has been completely extinguished. No victims or casualties have been reported but the damage cannot be estimated. A self-styled organization named October 1980 took responsibility for the fire this morning with an anonymous call to the papers.

Prime Minister Rallis, Public Order Minister Dhavakis and Public Order Ministry Secretary General Kapsalis arrived at the site of destruction at 0600 today. Shortly after, a conference was held at the political office under Prime Minister Rallis, with participation of the minister of public order and other officials. The conference examined today's fires.

All the parties in the Chamber of Deputies which has been meeting since 1130 today, headed by Prime Minister Rallis, have condemned the criminal action--as they have described it--which resulted in the destruction of the Minion and Katrantzos Spor stores.

Answering a motion by EDIK [Democratic Center Union] leader Zigdhis, who asked for a debate on the incidents, Prime Minister Rallis said that he is not yet in a position to give concrete information about the causes and the culprits of this criminal action. He added: It is necessary to have an in-depth examination of the incidents, and he stressed that, if necessary, the government will make use of special article 44 of the constitution that provides for emergency legislative measures to protect those who have been hit by this criminal action.

Other speakers who also addressed the Chamber and agreed with the description of the action as criminal as well as with the need for measures to protect those who have been hit, were PASOK parliamentary spokesman Alevras, Center Party leader Mavros, EDIK leader Zigdhis, EDA [United Democratic Left] Chairman Iliou, former Prime Minister Kanellopoulos and KKE parliamentary spokesman Kaloudhis. The opposition parties asked the government for a Chamber debate at the conclusion of the investigations in order to discover who are responsible for these activities and which forces they are serving.

Pro-Junta Officers Accused

[Exclusive I AVYI report: "The 'Easter Movement' Burnt Omonia--the Central Intelligence Service Turns Investigations Toward Junta Officers"]

[Excerpt] KYP, the Central Intelligence Service, is now dealing with three officers who have interconnections with the extreme rightist military organization "The Easter Movement." KYP is investigating the movements of these officers in the early hours of last Friday. The questioning falls within the silent and secret KYP investigations which started after urgent instructions from a high government echelon for the immediate discovery and arrest of the perpetrators of the Omonia sabotage action. As of noon yesterday, general responsibility for the investigations was taken over by KYP while the General Security Service limits itself to investigations of minor matters (such as searches in the homes of leftists).

The cause for this was not only the inability of the Security Service to discover the perpetrators of previous terror incidents but also the fact that these provocative activities are being executed with military precision and equipment.

It is reported that the incendiary equipment which destroyed the Minion and Katranzos shops was not a time mechanism but that it was activated by electronic telecommunication means. Such equipment is available to the army and is used for "high priority" sabotage. It is even reported that it is only stored in the Army Headquarters depot. Perhaps these incendiary bombs are the starting point for definitive searches.

What Is the "Easter Movement"

According to exclusive information available to I AVYI, the group of three officers approached by KYP had interconnections with the "Easter Movement" which is a well-known military organization which tried to create incidents during Easter of 1977. Dozens of the officer members of this organizations were quietly dismissed from the Armed Forces a short time later and a senior officer--a cadre of the organization--was dismissed under the excuse that "he suffered a mental relapse."

After the Bambalis murder, authorities conducted investigations among these young officers for possible involvement in the murder. It is reported that during the investigations--which were kept secret--a minister said, "if it is proved they were involved I will execute them with my own hands."

Three of these dismissed junta officers denounced to the appropriate authorities-during other investigation for fascist bomb incidents--a young fascist who was arrested.

KKE ACCUSES AVEROF OF PROVOCATIVE STATEMENTS

[Excerpt] Defense Minister Averof has described the general demand to democratize the armed forces, secure humane living conditions and reduce the term of national service for recruited youths as an "antinational" and "undermining" action. In a statement yesterday following his secret meeting with U.S. Ambassador McCloskey, Averof launches new open threats against democratic freedoms in an effort to revive the climate of force and terrorism that prevailed prior to the dictatorship.

Citing a KNE [Communist Youth Organization] placard on democratizing the army, he "warns" the "organized minorities"--as he describes the communist and the other progressive forces--that the rightwing "is not inclined to give in" but that "it will defend itself" by protecting "our democratic society"!

Averof's statement comes immediately on the heels of the well-known provocative reports carried by the two juntaist papers that prepared the ground for the minister's official "appearance." The statement also fans and encourages the campaign that has been undertaken by the rightwing to talk about present dangers in view of the elections, thus openly providing government cover for the cheap anticommunism of its mouthpieces.

In a statement released yesterday, the KKE Central Committee Press Bureau denounces the defense minister's claims as provocative and says that they serve to spark off terrorist attacks against the KKE and the KNE members in view of the elections. The statement also points out that Averof has no legal right to pose as "superpatriotic" and as a "proprietor" of the armed forces because of both his well-known attitude during the dictatorship and his leading role in the activities connected with the reenclavement and the bases.

GOVERNMENT MEETINGS WITH TURKISH CYPRIOT LEADERS

Denktas Arrives in Ankara

TA202022 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 2000 GMT 20 Dec 80

[Text] The president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, arrived in Ankara this evening to hold talks with government officials. He was received at Esenboga Airport by State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Zeyyat Baykara. In a statement at the airport, Denktas said that during his talks a general assessment would be made of the intercommunal talks. Recalling that the first stage of the intercommunal talks was not completed, Denktas said that he would exchange views in Ankara on what could be done during the second stage which begins in January. Zeyyat Baykara expressed the belief that Turkey and the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus would share the same views on the issues to be discussed.

Meanwhile, the Turkish Cypriot negotiator at the intercommunal talks, Umit Suleyman Onan, who is in Geneva for contacts in connection with the missing persons issue of Cyprus, is expected to arrive in Ankara tonight.

The Turkish Cypriot minister of foreign affairs, defense and tourism, Kenan Atakol, who is in New York for talks with UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim, is expected to arrive in Ankara tomorrow. Onan and Atakol will attend the talks between Denktas and the government officials in Ankara.

Denktas Meeting With Leaders

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas, who arrived in Ankara recently to make a joint assessment of the intercommunal talks with Turkish Government officials, has begun his contacts. Denktas called on Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen at 0930. In a statement before the meeting, Turkmen recalled that this meeting had been planned in October and that the intercommunal talks will be assessed. Denktas said that ways to reach a joint Cyprus solution will be discussed at the meeting.

Denktas called on Prime Minister, Bulent Ulusu at 1000. In a statement before the meeting, Ulusu expressed his happiness over having Denktas and his colleagues in Turkey. Noting that the first three rounds of the intercommunal talks had successfully been concluded, Ulusu expressed the belief that this success would continue. Denktas said that the aim was to establish a joint system that will ensure Turkish Cypriot rights in Cyprus and that will eliminate their troubles. Denktas added that the Turkish Cypriot side expected the Greek Cypriot side to show the same understanding at the talks, which were being conducted with good will.

FOREIGN MINISTERS MEETING IN BRUSSELS 'POSITIVE'

["A Glance at the World" column by Sami Kohen: "Hopes and Anxieties"]

[Excerpts] The meeting of the foreign ministers of Turkey and Greece in Brussels after the secretaries general of both ministries concluded their preparatory work in Athens has been as successful as expected. It was out of the question that such a meeting would settle issues that required time (such as the continental shelf dispute). The aim of this dialogue was to soften the atmosphere, establish reciprocal confidence, and discuss matters that are easier to settle.

In view of the above, the outcome of the Brussels meeting can be regarded as positive. Agreement has been reached on certain gestures and decisions that would establish reciprocal confidence. Apart from this, matters related to the Aegean airspace issue, the settlement of which now seems possible, were also taken up seriously. It is understood from what the Greek foreign minister has said that positive developments are expected to take place in this respect during the forthcoming weeks.

What is expected, of course, is that Greece abandon certain moves that, contrary to previous agreements, have banned Turkish access to most of the Aegean airspace during the past few years--including lifting control around the island of Limnos and abandoning the W-14 air corridor. If Athens were to end its restrictions in the Aegean airspace in return for Turkey's annulment of NOTAM 714 and a favorable response toward Greece's return to NATO's military wing, it would be making a positive contribution toward eliminating the mistrust that has existed for so long between both countries and toward settling other issues.

MARTIAL LAW OFFICE REPORTS ON 'ANARCHIC INCIDENTS'

TA211826 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 21 Dec 80

[Statement issued by the chief of staff's Martial Law Military Services Coordination Directorate on "anarchic incidents" from 12 November to 12 December]

[Text] A total of 821 crimes in violation of martial law were committed between 12 November and 12 December 1980. Of the crimes committed during that period, 459 involved pasting posters or placards and distributing pamphlets, 123 were robberies, 82 were armed assaults and clashes with security forces, 57 were throwing bombs and committing arson and 9 were blackmailing and similar crimes. Of these crimes, 11 were committed by rightist activists, 560 by leftist activists and 12 by secessionist groups. It was not possible to determine the ideological direction of the perpetrators of 238 crimes. However, they are believed to have been ideologically motivated.

During the 1-month period, 48 persons were killed in assaults, of which 8 are members of the security forces. Of the members of security forces who were martyred, one gendarme was killed in Urfa, one policeman in Adana and the others were ambushed on duty or on their way to their duty. Of the total number of persons killed, 15 were terrorists who died during armed clashes with security forces. Four of these terrorists were killed in Samsun, two in Ordu's Fatsa Fistrict, two in Artvin and seven in other provinces. The number of persons killed in terrorist attacks was 33, including members of security forces.

Another 97 persons were wounded in ideological crimes which were committed during the 1-month period. In operations and searches conducted during the same period, security forces captured a total of 5,018 suspects and legal action was started against them. Of these suspects, 149 persons belong to rightist groups, 706 to leftist groups and 189 to secessionist groups. The ideology of 3,974 suspects could not be determined. According to initial findings, 2,604 of these suspects were arrested for participating in various crimes.

The following weapons were seized during body searches and searches conducted in suspects' houses; 201 rifles of various types and calibers, 54 submachineguns, 1,174 pistols, 115,083 rounds of ammunition and 562 bombs.

During the period from 12 October to 12 November, the number of crimes committed was 1,012 and the number of crimes committed since 12 November has decreased. A total of 821 crimes were committed between 12 November and 12 December. A 23 percent decrease has been noted in the number of crimes committed compared with the previous 1-month period. The number of persons killed from 12 November to 12 December was 33 compared with 48 during the previous 1-month period, resulting in a 30 percent decrease in the number of fatalities.

HAIG APPOINTMENT IMPORTANT STEP AWAY FROM DETENTE

NC220954 Istanbul CUMHURIYET in Turkish 20 Dec 80 p 3

["The World Today" column by Ali Sirmen: "Haig's Friendship"]

[Excerpts] Haig's appointment can be regarded as a new and important step on the path leading away from detente in foreign politics. In fact, Alexander Haig confirmed this in a statement he made after his appointment was announced. Certain circles in Turkey deem the appointment of General Alexander Haig, the former NATO commander, as the secretary of state as very useful. The view that Haig is pro-Turkish is widespread in these circles.

When asked to express his views regarding the news that Reagan will officially appoint Haig as secretary of state as soon as he takes office, Minister of Foreign Affairs Ilter Turkmen said: "General Haig's appointment as secretary of state will contribute positively toward our bilateral relations. We have heard of his appointment with great pleasure. He is well acquainted with the chief of our general staff and with force commanders. They are friends.

Judging by what has been said by Turkmen, who became well-known as an experienced diplomat before taking up office in the Turkish Foreign Ministry, it would be wrong to believe that he also vests much confidence--as certain circles do--in Haig's pro-Turkish sentiments. In diplomatic language, Turkmen's remarks merely mean an expression of good wishes.

In politics and international relations, however, individual friendships have little effect. No one should have any doubt that Haig's policy, the basic principles of which will be set by the White House, will be aimed more at preparing the ground for the success of U.S. initiatives than at satisfying friends.

FRANCOIS-PONCET TO DISCUSS CHAD WITH LIBYAN ENVOY

LD192046 Paris Domestic Service in French 1700 GMT 19 Dec 80

[Text] This must be a special kind of Libyan humor: Colonel al-Qadhdhafi has just warned the world powers against any kind of interference in Chad. The Libyan leader, who is expected in Ndjamena this weekend to attend Goukouni's victory celebrations, will be going at a time when there are 6,000 Libyan troops in Chad, plus aircraft and armored vehicles. We must remind listerers that on Monday a Libyan envoy will be received at the Quai d'Orsay by Foreign Minister Jean Francois-Poncet, who will express the concern felt by France at Libya's policy in Africa, particularly in Chad. Jean Francois-Poncet will recall that France is neither inactive nor indifferent but supports any initiative that might be started by the African heads of state aimed at restoring peace, unity and independence to Chad.

Libya Warned on Interference

[Text] Regarding Chad, Paris has issued a new warning to Libya. The French prime minister on foreign affairs met his Libyan counterpart in Paris last night and recalled the principle of noninterference in internal affairs that rules relations between states and guides France's policy in Africa. In other words, Paris wishes that the people of Chad determine their future on their own, free from any foreign military presence. Once again, Ralph Pinto, France wants an African solution.

[Pinto] There was straight talking and, as the diplomats say, the French minister of foreign affairs spoke to Al-Qadhdhafi's minister in very firm terms, telling him: Leave Chad free to do what it wants. Withdraw. There are agreements--those of Lagos--for all the Chadian factions to come to agreement, and we are ready to help them. The communique of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs is thus the logical follow-up to a first communique published a little more than a week ago at the Elysee. Libya is not violently denounced, it is not being attacked, but it is made to understand that the African family will not be able to tolerate Libyan interference for long. One has to ask now whether Al-Qadhdhafi can heed the advice or can admit that in fact he has made a mistake, and one has to rely on a new conference, the sixth, still in Lagos, in Nigeria which begins this morning. This time it is between 10 heads of state, but who is going to come for Libya? At any rate, Colonel al-Qadhdhafi's Chadian proteges do not want to make the journey. However, Libyan aggression and imperialism are so flagrant that it is well possible this time that the Lagos conference will agree, at least, and firmly on one directive: Hands off, Al-Qadhdhafi.

ROBERT GALLEY APPOINTED DEFENSE MINISTER

[Excerpt] Robert Galley has been appointed minister of defense. He succeeds Joel le Theule who died of a heart attack a little over 1 week ago. Mr Galley keeps his portfolio of minister of cooperation and will thus occupy two posts. The choice is logical and does not cause surprise.

REAGAN, HAIG SEEN AS 'PERFECTLY COHERENT' TEAM

LD221531 Paris LE FIGARO in French 18 Dec 80 p 1

[Jacques Jacquet-Francillon article: "Why Haig?"]

[Text] The mandate conferred on him by the nation was clear: Enough evasions! Ronald Reagan has realized this and has made a good start. Even before settling down in the Oval Office, he has just shown that he is able to take risks to achieve his objectiv

What he wanted was to entrust Gen Alexander Haig with the task of implementing his policy. As for the risk, it is that the Republican Senate majority could be unable to prevent the Democratic opposition from turning the public debate preceding the vote confirming the next secretary of state into an interminable inquiry into the past of Richard Nixon's former aide. Ted Kennedy, whose eyes are already riveted on the 1984 horizon, is not concealing his intention of doing just that. And he has the means to do it.

So was it indispensable to choose for the highest office in the Cabinet hierarchy a man who was White House chief of staff in the months preceding the epilogue to the Watergate drama? Even though no one has ever accused him of any misdeed, would it not be easy to stir up through him the mud of a scandal which cost America so much and which, as it were, crippled the Republican Party for 6 years?

Perhaps not all the old demons have yet been exorcised. There is a danger. Ronald Reagan is defying it because he believes that General Haig is the best choice. Why?

Because of his ability and of the experience he has of both strategic and military problems and international problems as a whole. This is certain. But even more because his very presence at the head of the State Department will represent a deterrent force against the Soviet Union which will limit the Kremlin's room for maneuver.

For no one can have any doubts about the former NATO supreme commander's determination. He has always clearly and openly said what he thinks. He did not wait for the Red Army invasion of Afghanistan to denounce the illusions of detente. He denounced them as soon as Fidel Castro's first "Barbudos" landed in Angola.

His favorite leitmotiv, which he again repeated on the rostrum of the Republic convention in Detroit on the eve of Reagan's nomination, can be summarized in a few words: Any attempt to turn "detente" and "security" into the two "pillars" of the West's defense policy is a delusion. In Alexander Haig's view these two "pillars" must be "strength" and reciprocity.

This message has a double meaning. Obviously, it is addressed to Moscow, but it is also addressed to America's European allies, about whose weakness and partiality for shilly-shallying he learned from personal experience only too well when he was recently in command.

Now Ronald Reagan has adopted these formulas because they very closely represent views which he has long held. Reagan-Haig: The team is perfectly coherent. What it means is consistent with the choice made by the American electorate on 4 November. It foretells that the "awakening" of the great nation which Jimmy Carter has been unable to mobilize is to become reality. This could well cause a stir.

FRENCH MISSILE FIRMS SURVEYING IRAQI MARKET

LD1816]4 Paris LE MONDE in French 11 Dec 80 p 12

[Jacques Isnard report: "Iraq Is Trying To Buy a Modern Anti-Aircraft Missile System From France"]

[Text] Iraq has questioned French arms suppliers on the terms under which it could be supplied with a close-range anti-aircraft defense system using missiles. Two of the industrial groups concerned, the private Matra group and the National Industrial Aerospace Company [SNIAS] already have missions in Iraq sounding out the Iraqi market or are about to send such missions.

Iraq, drawing initial conclusions from its conflict with Iran, has noted that its territory's air cover is inadequate, particularly against aircraft attacking at low altitude.

The weapons systems which provide such air protection and which are designed in France are the Matra's Crotale surface-to-air missiles which has already been sold to foreign countries (to several Arab states in particular) and SNIAS' Roland surface-to-air missile which is jointly produced with the FRG and marketed by the Euromissile Export Company (particularly to several Latin American countries and under license by Boeing and Hughes in the United States).

Despite their differences the Crotale and Roland call upon fairly similar operating principles: very short reaction time, mobility according to the objectives to be defended, and automation of the operations for the missile's employment for ranges of 6 km to 7 km.

The initial requirements expressed by Iraq comprise 200 weapon launching systems--an armored vehicle carrying several launching ramps which can be recharged with missiles--and the accompanying electronics systems. The French Airforce is equipped with Crotale missiles while the navy opted for a naval version of the Matra missiles and the French Army has ordered 200 Roland systems.

At the same time Iraq has revived its plan to modernize its naval forces and the French and Italians are competing for the deal. In addition to purchasing surface ships Iraq is contemplating buying Matra's Otomat anti-ship missile. The recent conclusion of a similar naval contract between France and Saudi Arabia has prompted French suppliers to make new offers to Iraq.

In a written question to the defense minister, so far unanswered, Charles Hernu, PS deputy for Le Rhone, expressed concern over the supply to Iraq of Mirage F-1 interceptors which may have been taken from the supplies intended for the French Air Force.

MARCHAIS ON RELATIONS WITH PS, ELECTORAL TACTICS

[Unattributed report: "Yes to Union But Union for Real Change"]

[Text] Georges Marchais, who was in La Var yesterday, replied to three questions asked by French Television Channel 3 in Nice. The journalist questioned the Communist presidential candidate on PS National Secretary Lionel Jospin's recent statement that if Francois Mitterrand were to be elected, the Communists would participate in the government provided they played the game and stood down in the second round.

George Marchais: Listen, Lionel Jospin is in no position to impose preconditions. Before talking about the second round we must wait until the first round is over. As far as the PCF is concerned, our position is clear. We want to put an end as quickly as possible to this government and its policy, which is having disastrous consequences for the workers and for the nation. Our adversary is Giscard d'Estaing. We want to defeat him. We want change. It is in that spirit that I submitted 131 proposals to the French people, listing 4 objectives and 3 means of attaining them. Therefore we want to defeat Giscard d'Estaing. We want to do so to bring about change, real change and to steer the country out of the crisis. Of course that presupposes the formation of a powerful people's movement, a majority movement of French men and women. It presupposes struggle, it presupposes a union, the leftwing union. That is our policy.

Question: However, the leftwing union is in a bad state.

Georges Marchais: If the leftwing union is in a bad state it is because the PS broke it in 1977. At that time we said: The PS has swung to the right. Today Lionel Jospin is suggesting to Chirac, who is responsible for the present policy and who gives full support to Giscard d'Estaing in the National Assembly, that he should be given ministries. Today the PS is saying it is prepared to govern with Chirac. Well, French men and women realize that the Communists did not deceive them when they spoke of the PS' swing to the right in 1977. We Communists want union, union for real change, for a different policy serving the workers. I would like to add that the Communists will struggle for victory to the end. They are prepared to assume all their responsibilities in running the country's affairs. Moreover, I think that one of the fundamental reasons for the difficulties we are experiencing is that the working class and the Communists, its representatives, have all too long been kept out of running the nation's affairs.

LE MONDE: PRESIDENCY CONTACTS PS, RPR ON 'AFFAIRS'

[Text] On Wednesday, 10 December, LE CANARD ENCHAINE published an article stating that the Presidency of the Republic has contacted the PS and RPR in hopes of ensuring that those parties' candidates do not mention the "affairs," particularly the Bokassa diamonds affair, during the election campaign. The article's author specifies that Elysee Secretary General Jacques Wahl had a meeting in this connection with one of Francois Mitterrand's closest advisers and that delegate Jean Riolacci had a meeting with Charles Pasqua, senator for Hauts-de-Seine, who until 1979 was Mr Chirac's adviser on RPR organization.

The Elysee has refused to comment on this. PS spokesman Laurent Fabius adopted a similar position, recalling his party's stance: "In this affair, as in any other, the PS demands that the matter be clarified without any personal attacks being made." However, it should be noted that, if there has been any meeting, it does not seem to have altered the PS attitude. During the latest Press Club broadcast Claude Estier, director of the Socialist weekly, L'UNITE, questioned Mr Monory on Bokassa's gifts, referring to an article in LE MONDE. In addition, in its subsequent edition L'UNITE returns to the Delpey affair.

Mr Pasqua, however, categorically denies the allegation and told us: "I have never met with Mr Riolacci to discuss that matter, neither in person nor by telephone nor in any other way. The suggestion is absurd."

GISCARDIST-GAULLIST RELATIONS SEEN DETERIORATING

LD191211 Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Dec 80 pp 1, 10

[Noel-Jean Bergeroux article: "Relations Between Giscard d'Estaing and Gaullists Continue To Deteriorate"]

[Text] Gaullism and the Gaullists: Through the end of his 7-year term in office this will have been the basic political problem which the chief of state has had to deal with. And you need to be very naive to believe--or to pretend to believe--as the French Democratic Union delegate general, Mr Pinto, does, that "there is no reason for there to be any other majority candidates than Mr Giscard d'Estaing in 1981." On the contrary, everything points to the fact that there will be others and at present it is they who are the main topic of discussion.

Be that as it may, things have evolved considerably since the RPR chairman was reproached by his own friends for shouting too loud.

There has been a striking chain of events in recent weeks: No sooner had the Gaullists' official leader adopted a stance of caution and relative silence than another champion emerged and announced that he was waging the struggle on behalf of all the general's heirs. Does this champion seem to be marking time and slow to get his second wind? Evangelism [pasionaria] takes over and launches an attack.

Jacques Chirac, Michel Debre and Marie-France Garaud: It seems that Gaullism can no longer exist under Giscardism without invoking revolt via one voice or another. Marie-France Garaud's 7 December letter to the chief of state is the latest example of this: passion, resentment, more passion and relentless hostility. Did she really ever believe in Giscardism? Did she believe in it for a single moment even in 1974 when she advised Mr Chirac to abandon his own party's candidate, Chaban-Delmas, and support Giscard d'Estaing? It seems unlikely now, and yet that would be ignoring the facts. A reading of the letter, revealing the aggressiveness, the meticulous reproaches, with which she explains to the chief of state how he cheated her, reveals the extent of her disappointment.

It is undoubtedly a disappointment of a political nature, but also a disappointment for tactical ends. Indeed, the studied toughness of the letter and the desire to publish it reflect a specific need: Mrs Garaud wants to secure among the Gaullists the role of an attacker ignorant of hidden thoughts of retreat and of scruples of moderation.

She is in fact convinced that the Gaullist party's representative in the presidential race, whoever he is, will inevitably be obliged to reflect on his opposition to the outgoing president when the time comes for the decisive choice to be made--when this candidate will have to say either "all in all, I prefer the outgoing president's victory" or "never mind, abstain, even if it means ensuring the victory of the Socialist adversary backed directly or indirectly by the Communist Party."

It is this unavoidable obligation which Mrs Garaud is evoking when she writes in LE NOUVEL OBSERVATEUR: "The candidate backed by the RPR in line with that party's present policy will objectively serve the outgoing president." And it is this "objective service" which she wants to show herself shunning when she publishes her fierce criticisms of the chief of state.

The letter is an indictment. It also frees its author of an "objectively" Giscardian past and also of a future governed by other impediments--a real impediment, because Mrs Garaud's steadfast anticommunism could well lead her to dislike one candidate less than the other in the second round, if she remains consistent with herself. In this way she would "objectively" be serving one candidate more than the other.

Major Disaffection

Furthermore, the great hulaballoo at present being created by the Gaullist "precandidates," together with the major public disaffection with Giscardism, is prompting some RPR representatives to advocate the mobilization of their own party. When Charles Pasque talks, as he did on Saturday, of the probability of Mr Chirac standing as a candidate, is he simply speaking in a personal capacity or has he been instructed to maintain interest in this candidacy, which the RPR chief has personally forbidden himself to mention before January? To keep silent is one thing but to leave others to speak on one's behalf is another, which is perhaps not entirely consistent with Mr Chirac's temperament--especially when as a politician he must be aware of the favorable signs among the public.

For his part, Pierre Messmer is loudly urging his comrades to show a little more unitary spirit. One cannot fail to recall his failure in the same role in 1974, on Mr Chirac's behalf.

As for Chaban-Delmas, once again he is plunging into complex maneuvers and it is no longer very clear whether he is trying to rally the minor Gaullist groups with Giscard d'Estaing via Mr Debre's candidacy or complicating the UDF's task by drawing "analogies" between Gaullism and radicalism. So many subtleties are likely to harm someone eventually. But as for whom. . . .

As for the president of the republic, everything seems to indicate that his present assessment is that the multiplicity of Gaullist candidates only benefits Giscard d'Estaing. Of course this multiplicity reveals a breakup of the family, but it also threatens to permit the establishment of more voices in the hostility against the head of state, not to mention the anxieties which Mr Chirac's possible candidacy seems to be increasingly inspiring here. It is no coincidence, therefore, that Mr Lecanuet--who is never the last to "sense" such things--took the RPR chairman so vigorously to task on Sunday evening's Press Club on Europe 1. Just as perhaps it is no accident that Mrs Garaud has been prompted to complain of the small coverage she has been given on television and radio. . . .

As well as this unfavorable--to say the least--climate in the medium term, in the immediate term Giscard d'Estaing has the political problem posed by the untimely death of Defense Minister Joel le Theule. It will certainly not be easy to replace this competent man in military matters. If the head of state wishes to maintain the government's balance, he will have to find someone who will neither be rejected by the RPR . . . nor be unacceptable to Giscardists. Of course people are already mentioning the names of figures who could be called on to take charge of the Defense Ministry in the next few days. But we also recently saw another sign of what hard times these are for Giscardism and even for the Gaullists most favorably disposed toward it: Oliver Guichard wrote in LA REVUE DES DEUX MONDES some very restrained remarks concerning the reasons for the decline in "friendly relations between the majority and the president" (see LE MONDE 11 December).

Some Gaullists seem to be showing less support than ever: Over one third (38 percent) of the population believe that if the presidential elections are a "farce" it is "because of the disappointment caused by the policy pursued by the majority," while 16.1 percent are apparently "quite keen" to vote for a clown, a degree of popularity whose negative "troughs" have few precedents; the continuing threat posed by the enduring Bokassa diamonds affair (Mr Lecanuet's answer in this connection on Europe 1 perhaps implies a desire on the Elysee Palace's part to excise this wound)--together these are no small matter. Valery Giscard d'Estain has decided to await his moment and to play a game of patience by planning a campaign whose objective will without a doubt be to stand out clearly against the prevailing climate and to reestablish a balance in his own favor. But lately one side of the scales has been overburdened.

SAUDI FOREIGN MINISTER AL-FAYSAL CONCLUDES VISIT

[Text] Rome, 22 Dec (ANSA)--Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faysal wound up a two-day visit to Italy over the weekend, followed by a joint communique issued simultaneously in Rome and Jiddah Sunday. The document stressed that the visit was seen as deepening and strengthening bilateral relations between Italy and Saudi Arabia and between Europe and the Arab world, a policy both actively pursue.

The talks Faysal had in Rome stressed bilateral cooperation, but also the respective regional roles of the two countries on a political, economic and cultural level. Faysal and his Italian counterpart Emilio Colombo gave top priority to the finding of an overall solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict, a solution based on the principles of an Israeli withdrawal from all the land occupied since 1967 (including Jerusalem) and self-determination for the Palestinian people within the context of a fair, and lasting settlement that restores peace, stability and security to the region.

The two sides also recalled the resolutions with which the United Nations General Assembly, the Islamic Conference and the European Economic Community condemned the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan as a violation of the fundamental principles of the U.N. Charter at the expense of an independent, Islamic, neutral and nonaligned nation.

Given the continued Soviet military presence in Afghanistan, the two sides reiterated the need for a total withdrawal of these forces so that the Afghan people can freely determine their own future without foreign interference. The two sides also underscored the importance of economic and trade ties between Italy and Saudi Arabia, relations that will be fully developed along lines of mutual interest. With this in view, it was agreed that a mixed Italo-Saudi commission should meet as soon as possible and that concrete contacts should be made between public and private companies from both countries.

The Saudi foreign minister invited Colombo to make an official visit to Saudi Arabia. Colombo accepted with pleasure and the date of the visit is to be set up through normal diplomatic channels.

SOVIET AUCCTU DELEGATION DISCUSSES POLAND

[Unattributed report: "Rome Meeting of Soviet, Italian Trade Union Delegations"]

[Text] Rome--A delegation of the Soviet All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions [AUCCTU] led by Secretary and International Division Chief Aleksandr Subbotin visited Italy from 7-14 December at the invitation of the Italian General Confederation of Labor-Italian Confederation of Labor Unions--Italian Union of Labor Confederation. The Soviet trade union delegation had meetings with a delegation of the Italian federations' International Bureaus led by Bureau Chiefs Militello, Gabaglio and Izzo.

During the talks, which took place in an open and cordial atmosphere, there was a broad exchange of information on the situation and the role of the trade union organizations in the respective countries. The two delegations also broached numerous foreign policy issues, presenting their own viewpoints. Among other things, the Italian side confirmed "the positive verdict on the democratization process set in motion by the Polish workers' struggles" and expressed grave concern at the foreign pressures and threats with respect to Poland.

PCI OFFICIAL DEMARCHES OPPOSE POLISH INVASION

LD221229 Rome L'UNITA in Italian 10 Dec pp 1, 15

["Unattributed report: "PCI's Official Demarches With Respect to Eastern Bloc Communist Parties"]

[Excerpt] Rome--"The PCI Directorate has carried out official demarches over the past few days with respect to the communist parties of countries belonging to the Warsaw Pact to make known the Italian Communists' anxieties concerning the situation in Poland." This was announced yesterday by the PCI Press Bureau, in a communique which adds: "The PCI Directorate welcomes the agreements reached between the representatives of the workers and authorities of the Polish state and hopes that they will be positively implemented. At the same time, it emphasizes the dangers constituted by foreign interference and the very grave consequences that would result from a military intervention in that country. The substances of these demarches was announced in Comrade Paolo Bufalini's statement published in L'UNITA 6 December, and confirmed by Comrade Gerardo Chiaromonte in the conclusions of the national conference on state-aided industry."

NAPOLITANO OUTLINES PCI'S VIEW OF POLISH EVENTS

LD221211 Rome LA REPUBBLICA in Italian 13 Dec 80 pp 1,3 ("dossier supplement)

[Giampaolo Pansa interview with PCI Secretariat member Giorgio Napolitano: "If the USSR Makes a Mistake There Will Be a Break With Us"]

[Text] PCI Leader Giorgio Napolitano told me: "During the night of 20-21 August 1968 a telephone call from L'UNITA informed me that the Soviet military intervention in Czechoslovakia had begun. Longo was in Moscow and in his absence I was in charge of the party Secretariat. So on the morning of the 21st I had to summon the Politburo comrades."

[Question] What happened?

[Answer] There were no doubts concerning the substance of the "stern disagreement" that we had to express. Longo expressed the same opinion when we managed to speak on the telephone later that morning. The party secretary was very upset: Early in August there had been the Bratislava meeting and its reassuring outcome had suggested that the situation was not about to deteriorate rapidly. Having secured Longo's approval, we issued our communique of disagreement.

[Question] Were there any disputes regarding the "disagreement" at that morning's meeting?
[Answer] No. In any case we could not go back on the PCI Directorate's 17 July resolution following Pajetta's and Galluzzi's return from Moscow.

[Question] What did the Directorate document say?
[Answer] First it reasserted the PCI's solidarity with the policy of the Czechoslovak new course. Next it stated quite clearly that the differences of assessment between Dubcek's communist party and other Eastern-bloc communist parties concerning the regeneration process in Prague should be dealt with through bilateral or multilateral talks and within full observance of the principle of nonintervention. So as far as we were concerned the path of disagreement was already laid out. Nevertheless, it was a very trying time for us. And it was no easy matter to shoulder that responsibility.

[Question] What about Longo?
[Answer] He did even more. On his way back from Moscow he stopped over in Paris and expressed "disapproval" of the intervention.

It was a word which must have carried great weight for a leader such as he, who had experienced an "iron bond" with the USSR between the wars. One must bear in mind his political and human tragedy. I believe that this was one of the reasons for the sickness which struck him about a month later....

[Question] How did the grassroots view it?
[Answer] There was a debate and we witnessed some disputes. But there was broad support. Indeed, the late August Central Committee meeting added further reasons for our disagreement and formulated a number of stances which transcended the Czechoslovak issue and which, unfortunately, proved topical many years later and which are still topical now.

[Question] And what did you say?
[Answer] We stated that the Soviet intervention stemmed from a view of socialism and of its defense that should be rejected--the view that the mere emergence of opinions different from those of other communist parties constitutes an immediate threat to a socialist regime. It is the view which leads people to regard as agents of imperialism anyone in an Eastern bloc country who raises the issue of regenerating society, the political system or the party; the view on the basis of which the ideological conflict in those countries should be waged with administrative measures or military interventions rather than with purely ideological weapons.

[Question] The same thing is happening in Poland, is it not?
[Answer] I believe that these views, which we openly and vigorously condemned in 1968, are proving to be still alive and active in certain Eastern bloc communist parties.

[Question] But in 1976 on the 20th anniversary of the Budapest uprising, Longo and Amendola confirmed in L'UNITA that the Soviet intervention in Hungary was correct. Are there perhaps good and bad tanks?

[Answer] I remember those two articles. And I must tell you that we are indeed still attached to the idea that 1956 in Hungary was something different from 1968 in Czechoslovakia.

[Question] But where does this difference lie?
[Answer] With regard to the Hungary of 1956 you cannot talk in terms of a Communist Party that involved itself successfully in a peaceful process of political regeneration and was then indicted and eventually overthrown by a foreign military intervention. Budapest was in fact the theater for a tragic rupture and an outright collapse of both party and state.

[Question] But the Soviet tanks did their work along the Danube too...
[Answer] I am not evading the principle of nonintervention. But I ask myself the following question: Was this principle violated in the same unmistakable way both in Hungary in 1956 and in Czechoslovakia in 1968? I believe this is a legitimate subject for debate, but I insist on the major differences between the two situations. Furthermore, how can I put it?--you can invoke the exceptional nature of a particular situation to justify even a military invasion once, but you cannot do it twice.

[Question] And yet what happened the second time, in Prague, and what is threatening to happen for the third time, in Warsaw, should prompt you to revise your old verdict on Hungary....
[Answer] Frankly I see no advantage in a summary revision 24 years later. In any case, that verdict has become more complex and problematical already, as a seminar organized by the Gramsci Institute has shown.

[Question] Nevertheless, should you not "rehabilitate" the comrades expelled from the PCI in 1956?
[Answer] They were not expelled: they left. And the door has always been open to any of them who wanted to return.

[Question] But who was right, you or they?
[Answer] We do not ask anyone who comes back to acknowledge that we were right.

[Question] But Warsaw today is very reminiscent of Budapest in 1956....
[Answer] I say that it is reminiscent above all of Poland in 1956. As for the present, we have judged as positive the way in which the Polish Communist Party has reacted to the explosion of a new movement among the workers and managed to produce a leadership group open to the demand for a real regeneration. And we hope that there will be the desire and the possibility to carry this line forward, to begin a change in the political system and in relations between the party and trade unions which will permit a richer and freer social life in Poland.

[Question] Deputy Napolitano, Moscow does not like what the PCI is hoping for and is reacting badly to the PCI's stances. Did it react badly to your "disagreement" in 1968?
[Answer] Yes, the Soviets were polemical with us....but, you see, proper diplomatic rules have gained ground even in relation among communist parties. When at the 12th PCI Congress in Bologna in 1969 Longo presented a report which confirmed all our stances on the military intervention in Prague, Zagladin, who was a member of the CPSU delegation, was keen to have an autographed copy of the report right away.

[Question] Perhaps because Zagladin's ears were not accustomed to hearing such words from a communist leader....
[Answer] No, believe me: Zagladin is a person of considerable political and diplomatic perspicacity.

[Question] Did you read Zagladin's interview with LA REPUBBLICA? What do you think of it?
[Answer] It confirms my assessment of him, though obviously for various reasons we cannot be satisfied with the interview.

[Question] You too were very "diplomatic" with Prague. Following the tanks in 1968, the PCI abandoned Dubcek to his fate....
[Answer] That is not true. After August, as long as part of that leadership group remained standing, we tried to give it our support, partly in nonpublic ways. For instance, we tried to maintain links with people such as Smrkovsky. Adn we pressed for a possible return of new course representatives to their rights and their political role, within the context of some kind of compromise. Unfortunately, our effort was unsuccessful. I would like to point out too that since then our relations with the Czechoslovak Communist Party [CPCZ] have been broken off.

[Question] What about Pelikan? When he arrived in Italy as an exile he received assistance from [PSI secretary] Craxi but not from you.
[Answer] I do not believe that Pelikan could have agreed to wage his battle within the limits of a collective effort such as that of the PCI which, despite the very serious disagreements following Prague, intended to conduct a critical dialogue with the USSR within full autonomy....

[Question] Translated into clear terms, does that mean that Pelikan is too anti-Soviet for you?
[Answer] I consider it natural that Pelikan chose a path which enabled him to carry out his initiative without any of the anxieties and precautions which a major party such as ours, on the other hand, cannot ignore. Or let us say rather--could not ignore....

[Question] Do you feel closer to Pelikan or to the normalizer of Prague, CPCZ Secretary Husak?
[Answer] I definitely feel closer to the experience and line of what was called the Prague spring.

[Question] What does Husak represent for you.
[Answer] He is an old communist leader with whom I am not acquainted, whose past we always respected, but who after 1968 assumed a function which we cannot justify.

[Question] I will of you what I once asked Berlinguer: are there any potential Husaks in the PCI?
[Answer] Definitely not, Frankly I do not believe so.

[Question] Some people say that if the PCI now really does break away from the USSR, another, pro-Soviet, communist party led by one of you will emerge in Italy....
[Answer] This is not a new hypothesis. But it has never found the slightest foundation, even at times of acute divergence between ourselves and the USSR, even when with respect to the historical experience that began with the October Revolution we changed from an essentially apologetic attitude to a rigorous historical and critical approach. Remember what happened and what we said at the time of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

[Question] Yes, you did condemn it. But what a difference from Vietnam! Did you not send the partisans fighting the Soviets even a box of aspirins....
[Answer] I do not believe that anyone has sent anything! Other parties have conducted propaganda, however. Nevertheless, you cannot deny the extreme difficulty of identifying in Afghanistan a resistance movement politically definable and acceptable to us as an interlocutor. Be that as it may, following the invasion, the PCI did refuse to attend the Paris Communist Party conference. Precisely in connection with Kabul, we tried to promote a new internationalism and to fight for a new and much more open view of our relations with the other communist parties. And there is another reason for rejecting the propagandist suggestions of other leftwing Italian parties.

[Question] What is that?
[Answer] You see, the respect which we enjoy among other communist parties and in the East European countries enables us to perform a role in the interests both of detente and of the regeneration of those regimes.

[Question] Could you make that clearer, Deputy Napolitano?
[Answer] We are convinced that our ideas are heeded and objectively exert an influence in the East European countries. And we hope that the anxieties which we have expressed over Poland can carry some weight now.

[Question] Perhaps you are deluding yourselves. The USSR still reasons according to the logic of an imperial bloc; it sees that an opposition party, Solidarity, has emerged in Poland and is afraid of the contagion spreading to the other Communist bloc countries. Within this framework, what influence can your anxieties have on the Kremlin leaders?
[Answer] First, it must be clearly repeated that neither Solidarity nor the Polish Communist Party wants to challenge Yalta or is aiming at all at an overthrow of the alliances and an alteration of the balance between the blocs

[Question] But this is exactly what the USSR is afraid of....
[Answer] This is an unacceptable assessment on the Soviets' part. And it would be dangerous if, for the sake of it, an attempt were to be made to impede every regeneration process in certain Eastern bloc countries--namely those where the degree of consensus with the communist regime is smaller and the need for changes greater. Instead, we repeat with stubborn insistence that these processes must advance and it is possible to advance them. In Poland the extension of the bases of consensus through reforms and changes has become a necessity for that society's life and development and one which cannot be repressed much longer.

[Question] It is very important for a PCI leader to say this. But it seems to me that the USSR is indeed planning to "repress" Poland....
[Answer] We should wait and see what the USSR will do. Let us take nothing for granted,

[Question] If the irreparable does happen, what will your grassroots say? When the USSR attacked Afghanistan some of your members approved of the intervention. Old comrades, but also some young ones, said: "After all, the USSR must defend its borders..." or "the Red Army was made to be mobilized."
[Answer] A distinction must be drawn between immediate, emotional, reactions, which can occur initially, and conclusions reached following a debate. And I would like to say this: In order to have the utmost consensus within the party with the line which we want to pursue with respect to Poland, it is important not to permit any confusions between this line and any tendency to abandon our socialist and internationalist ideals or to attenuate our struggle against all forms of imperialist exploitation and intervention in various parts of the world. Last, it is equally important to involve an ever-increasing number of our members in the decisions whereby our policy of total international autonomy evolves.

[Question] It does not seem to me that there is any mass debate on Poland in the PCI sections....
[Answer] This is true. A pointer was given some weeks ago for a campaign on international issues and Poland and the delay is due solely to our entire organization's very major commitment in connection with the earthquake. But we intend to remedy this delay promptly.

[Question] Paolo Robotti, one of the PCI's founding group, said on television that if you PCI leaders dare to break away from the USSR the grassroots will get rid of you....
[Answer] I do not believe there is any need to reply to an emotional outburst (which is how I wish to consider it) from an old comrade.

[Question] One final question: Let us suppose that instead of a foreign intervention similar to the Prague coup, Solidarity's repression and Poland's normalization are entrusted to internal forces, namely the Warsaw army and police. Would the repercussions on relations between you Italian Communists and the USSR be equally irreperable?
[Answer] Definitely. Though you have to draw the necessary distinctions, even in such an eventuality we could not close our eyes.

KKE LEADER FLORAKIS RAPS GREECE'S RETURN TO NATO

AU221342 East Berlin NEUES DEUTSCHLAND in German 16 Dec 80 p 5

["ND interview with Kharilaos Florakis, general secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Greece--Exterior: Return Into NATO-A Shackle For Greece"]

[Text] The late October decision by the Athens government to reincorporate Greece into NATO's military organization has elicited a storm of protests amongout country's democratic forces and deep concern internationally. Kharilaos Florakis granted NEUES DEUTSCHLAND the following interview about the background and consequences of this step:

Question: In the view of the Greek Communist Party [KKE], what are the consequences of your government's decision on Greece's reentry into the NATO military organization?

Answer: The Greek working people regardless of party affiliation, have had bitter experiences with NATO. It was only a few years ago that they survived the 7-year military dictatorship and the junta putsch on Cyprus. The popular wrath was so extensive that the rightwing government found itself compelled in 1974 to resort to the maneuver of leaving the NATO military organization. One month ago it decided to reenter it. Our people feel the consequences that this action will have on the development of our country and of its life and therefore regard the reincorporation as a national sellout.

The decision will have serious consequences on our country's international role, foreign policy and internal development. Particularly today in a period of great tensions in international relations stemming from the more intense aggressiveness of imperialism, the reincorporation constitutes a cold war act and another blow to detente.

The reincorporation with the aim of stabilizing NATO's southeast flank and the imminent signing of the U.S. base agreement will transform our country into an outpost for implementing the new aggressive strategic U.S. plans in the tense Middle East and Persian Gulf area.

The shackles of the imperialist political, military and economic dependence of our country will tighten with the reincorporation. The armed forces will virtually come under the control of NATO and the United States.

Greek foreign policy will be fully subjected to the NATO concept and its possibilities of pursuing a policy of peace, friendship and cooperation with all countries, particularly with the socialist and nonaligned ones, will decrease.

By means of the reincorporation of our country in NATO, the imperialists are also pursuing the objective of implementing the old NATO plan for Cyprus to virtually divide Cyprus and maintain foreign troops and bases there.

But the decision has far-reaching consequences not just on foreign policy. Our country's ruling class also regards NATO and the EC as supports in its struggle against the popular movement, for foiling a democratic upheaval and generally for stabilizing its dependent exploitation system which today is undergoing a deep crisis.

Question: How do you assess the people's resistance to the decision?

Answer: Large mass actions, parliamentary struggles and election campaigns have developed for 6 years with the objective of leaving NATO altogether, removing U.S. bases from our territory and pursuing a policy of national independence and peace.

The overwhelming majority of Greek people objected to NATO which is why the rightists did not dare in the 1977 elections to propagate the reincorporation in NATO as their political line. Today's return to NATO by the ruling "new democracy" party contradicts the will of the people and creates a rift with them.

This is why our people immediately responded to the reincorporation decision with resolute protests, and multifaceted powerful demonstrations that enveloped the entire country. In these actions the KKE members and sympathizers stood in the foremost ranks.

These struggles have merged with the vast mass actions and strikes of the working people against the government policy of moderation and self-containment. They have come to a climax thus far in the strike of 1.5 million working people that enveloped the entire country.

Hence, there has been progress in developing the organized mass movement of the people which constitutes the sole path to the victory of another policy. With their resolute massive resistance the Greek people have shown that they will not recognize incorporation into the EC and NATO and the existence of foreign bases as an accomplished fact.

Question: What prospects does the KKE see in the country's political life for developing a policy of peace, cooperation and friendship in Greece?

Answer: The "New Democracy" government was, and is even more so today, a minority government. It is discrediting itself by its policy of national sellout. Its immediate resignation and the calling of elections are an urgent national requirement. It is possible today for the forces of the democratic opposition to come out of the elections with a parliamentary majority and to jointly form a democratic government. If such a government relies on all anti-imperialist democratic forces, the organized people's movement and the KKE, it will have the power to implement a program of national independence, peace and cooperation with all countries, a program of democratization, curtailment of arbitrariness of the monopolies and development which benefits the people.

The further resolute development of struggle, the purposeful strengthening of the KKE as the most consistent and indomitable force constitute basic prerequisites for achieving this objective for the benefit of our people and for establishing the required alliance of the anti-imperialist forces.

VOTCP ON U.S. BASE DEMANDS, HAIG APPOINTMENT

TA201323 (Clandestine) Voice of Turkish Communist Party in Turkish to Europe and Turkey 0600 GMT 20 Dec 80

[Station commentary: "On The Foreign Minister's News Conference"]

[Excerpt] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen held a news conference in Ankara after his return from the NATO meetings. He gave evasive replies to various questions. For example, in reply to a question about his views on reports that the United States is using the Incirlik base as a depot within the framework of the recent bilateral agreements, Turkmen said: No such request has been submitted to Turkey. We do not know of such a thing. However, in an article published in MILLIYET on 12 December, Mehmet Ali Birand reported that the United States submitted its requests to Turkey concerning the Rapid Deployment Force it formed for possible intervention in the Middle East or the Gulf region. Birand had this to say about the U.S. request: The U.S. demand submitted to Turkey included the right for this force to pass over Turkey on its way to the Middle East, the right to refuel if necessary, and the right to pick up arms, ammunition and troops from certain parts of Turkey if necessary.

For the time being, the junta said that Turkey cannot participate in any operation that remains outside the NATO framework. However, in recent NATO meetings in Brussels both U.S. administrators and NATO leaders have expressed the opinion that Turkey would not be able to resist pressures on this issue. Furthermore, there is also the bilateral slavery agreement signed with the United States during the Demirel government. This agreement gives permanence to the U.S. bases on our soil. It grants new spy and assault bases to the United States. It also grants U.S. imperialism the right to armed interference in Turkey's domestic affairs.

The United States used the Incirlik base in its Iran adventure. General (Wood), who participated in this adventure, was formerly stationed at the Incirlik base. As pointed out by Senator for Life Tunckanat in a statement published in CUMHURIYET on 29 April, there are nuclear arms at the Incirlik base, which the United States views as a bridgehead for its policy of intervention in the Gulf. These nuclear arms constitute a great danger to security in our country and region.

Is Foreign Minister Turkmen not aware of these realities? NEWSWEEK reported that Pentagon generals view Turkey as the ideal country and that they are preparing to delegate new responsibilities to Turkey in connection with the Middle East policy. Isn't Turkmen aware of this either? Of course, he is aware. However, he does not dare question U.S. administrators on this issue. Even if he asks he cannot learn the realities because the NATO and U.S. bases on our soil are closed to Turkish officials. The Turkish soldier is responsible for guarding these bases of aggression. Even this much is sufficient to confirm how our national sovereignty is being trampled upon and how our national dignity is being ridiculed.

The statement made by Turkmen on Haig's appointment as the U.S. secretary of state is heart breaking. Turkmen noted that this appointment will be beneficial for Turkey. He said: Haig is a former soldier. He is the former commander of the NATO allied forces. He is well acquainted with Turkey. He was understanding about the 12 September operation. Turkmen's statement on Haig's appointment is a disgrace to Turkey. As reported in an article in HURRIYET on 17 December, four separate court cases were filed against Haig during his term as chief of staff during the Nixon administration. Haig is a Pentagon general who has committed atrocities against the heroic people of Vietnam. He is a profiteer who was indicted in connection with his involvement in the Watergate scandal. These characteristics show what kind of a contribution Haig will make to Turkey. It can be said that Haig's appointment is a manifestation of the policy of tension that endangers our national sovereignty.

FOREIGN MINISTER INTERVIEWED ON CSSR VISIT

[Correspondent Hauschild interview with Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher, date, place of interview not given]

[Text] [Question] Following the Brussels NATO decisions concerning the situation in Poland, the GDR leadership labeled you an agitator. Did you succeed in Prague in reestablishing with your hosts the credibility of the Western position of painstaking restraint on the Polish issue?

[Answer] As far as your initial remark is concerned, we have made it quite clear that we will not be dissuaded from our course of firmness and circumspectedness, even by polemics. As for my talks in Prague, it is also true that it was important to elucidate during the discussion of East-West relations the position we have adopted jointly with our partners in the European Community and in the Western alliance, also in connection with events surrounding the People's Republic of Poland.

I believe that it is important particularly at a time such as we have now that the attitude of the West--and this is a totally uniform stance--be understood by the other side and thus also be predictable. The position of the West is one of firmness on the issue at hand and of circumspection in its implementation; but it is also a position which indicates that we are prepared to continue the policy of cooperation with the states of the East if all parties involved abide by the commitments which we have jointly undertaken in the Helsinki Final Act. Today, by the way, my Norwegian counterpart is in Moscow. This visit, too, will surely serve to elucidate the Western position.

[Question] Did you manage to learn anything authentic about the present attitude of the Soviet Union toward the state of detente policy? Did any signals come from Moscow?

[Answer] It was quite evident that the Czechoslovak leadership intended to explain its own and the Warsaw Pact's views on the policy of cooperation with the West. This is why I have refrained from commenting on the visit per se, since what mattered to me was to make our stance clear. We now have the opportunity to assess what we heard in these talks.

[Question] I think the state of the bilateral relations between the Federal Republic and the CSSR has been neglected in the Western coverage so far because of the Polish issue. Talks in Prague involved, for example, trade, and the CSSR this year scored an export surplus for the first time. On the other hand, trade has been stagnating for quite some time. Do you have any explanation for that?

[Answer] First of all I would like to fully agree with your assessment. I think that with regard to Poland one can add that we should be considerate in our reaction but also firm. We should be prepared to help overcome the obvious bottlenecks that exist in Poland, that is, to give economic help. This should have priority now.

As regards our relations with the CSSR, we would have liked to have seen trade with the CSSR develop positively. The fact that for the first time the other side has a positive balance does not indicate anything about the amount of trade. Quite a lot could be done here. Most of all we wish that the other side would be more flexible in economic cooperation. It is probably also important to reach agreements on cooperation in third markets. This is not sensational. We have such tested agreements with other Warsaw Pact states, or--as one should better say in this case--with CEMA. They work quite well. So we believe that quite a lot must still be done in the economic field. It must not ignored that the CSSR and the FRG are immediate neighbors, and that the industrial development of that country has reached quite a high level. This facilitiates economic cooperation.

[Question] In your talks with the Prague leadership you also acted for better work opportunities for Western journalists in the CSSR. Was rapprochement signalled to you on this?

[Answer] That was tried in connection with the visit. I indeed pointed out that the other side should actually also be interested in comprehensive reporting on developments in the CSSR. Future practice will show whether they did more than just listen; it will show how much of a reaction there will be.

It is quite natural that these problems should be discussed on the occasion of such a visit, problems which are of considerable significance to us in connection with the implementation of the Helsinki final document. There is the question of solving humanitarian problems. I have also acted on behalf of an implementation of the rights of Germans still living in the CSSR, rights that have been granted in legislation. They must still be developed in practice. In other words, and particularly when one visits a country with another social system, many such problems must be discussed, problems which are of considerable importance for many individual destinies. I must say that I was very impressed by my talk with the cardinal in Prague, a talk he also termed rather important.

[Question] The CSSR side on Saturday mentioned some remaining differences of opinion. What did that actually mean?

[Answer] Nobody can expect that such a visit to a country of the other pact system will overcome all different approaches. It would not be honest to create such an impression. There are some people who believe that this visit must be headlined with the word success, so to speak, and that things will start to move. The clarification of positions is important. Nobody will be surprised if I say that the approach to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan was different, and that we have a completely different position than the CSSR leadership.

GENSCHER, SPANISH FOREIGN MINISTER HOLD TALKS

[Text] Bonn, 22 Dec (DPA)--The Federal German Government has confirmed its interest in Spain's rapid entry into the European Community. In a detailed exchange of views today in Bonn with his Spanish opposite number, Jose Pedro Perez-Llorca, Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher underlined that the entry negotiations should be brought "swiftly and without delay to a successful conclusion." The Spanish foreign minister informed Genscher of the problems facing his country in view of the EC's fishery policy.

In discussing East-West relations the two foreign ministers agreed that at the present Madrid followup Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe agreement should be reached on the convening of a European disarmament conference. Perez-Llorca was received, at the conclusion of his 1-day working visit, by Federal President Karl Carstens

APEL INTERVIEWED ON DEFENSE, SECURITY POLICY ISSUES

DW221219 Cologne Deutschlandfunk Network in German to East and West German 1000 GMT 21 Dec 80

[Reporter Peter Heinemann interview with Defense Minister Hans Apel in the feature "Interview of the Week", place not given--recorded]

[Text] [Question] The public swearing-in of recruits was not a particular feather in your cap, and with regard to your own party as well. The awarding of military medals which you reintroduced, was a brave move, but it did not bring you any public glory, and the superbird "Tornado" with its financial disaster flew so closely by you that one could believe it would throw you out of your office.

New trouble is in the offing: Federal German arms exports to tension areas are being criticized. There was a brief pause this week, permitting a breather, due to the DM700 million which were alotted to the "Tornado" project. But in the next 5 years there will be a finance gap of at least DM10 billion. The already decided on procurements cannot be financed in the current financial framework. Mr Minister, is it at all possible to finance the Bundeswehr?

[Answer] Let me curtail your somewhat extensive enumeration of problems, permitting us to discuss the things for which the defence minister is really responsible: The Defense Ministry has nothing to do with arms exports. We are represented in the Federal Security Council and we take part in the voting there, but the Foreign Ministry is responsible for arms exports as well as the federal minister of economics. My only interest is concentrated on the fact that our NATO partners should have arms which ought to be as much as possible identical with ours. I am not an arms exporter of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Let us now discuss the future. Deficits cannot be calculated abstractly in a vacuum because they are the result of revenues and expenditures. We can certainly figure out rather definitely the probable expenditures for our arms systems, but because of the annual budget estimates--a new budget estimate is made every year--we do not have the ability to predict the revenues of the next 5 to 10 years in such a way that a figure such as a 10 billion deficit would be acceptable. We will hold a closed session on armaments in March--one ought to say more exactly, a closed monetary session--and we will quantify all recruitment systems and other monetary requirements of the defense field. We will achieve results; we will report to the Federal Cabinet and suggest alternatives permitting the making of decisions. We know that we can finance the great arms systems in 1981, although with some difficulties. We will be facing a difficult budget year, but we will keep the Bundeswehr in a state of readiness.

[Question] Mr Minister, you said that you are not the arms exporter of the Federal Republic, but you are represented in the Federal Security Council. Did the Federal Government show the necessary subtlety in connection with the two submarines for Chile?

[Answer] I am not prepared to bring up a debate which is still supposed to take place, as the federal chancellor told the SPD faction. This debate will take place, and then we will hear about the motives of the federal chancellor, the foreign minister and the minister of economics. We will then voice our opinion.

[Question] In March there will be a closed financial session, but there is not only a gap of DM10 billion, which we discussed, for the Tornado, the combat tank Leopard-2, the Alpha jet plane, the frigate F-122 and the Class 143 speedboats; there also is not money for barracks, housing projects, depots and sufficient ammunition. More money is needed for increased salaries for the military--some DM110 million are needed for a first step in this direction--some DM73 million are needed for promotions, and there are the army structural costs. Experts say that an additional amount of about DM21 billion will be necessary at present.

[Answer] I want to point out again that I am not prepared to answer such questions looking like a horror picture. I tell you most clearly: The 1981 budget has been decided on by the cabinet. If it will be adopted as it is by the Bundestag next June, we will be able to cope with the 1981 budget in a dignified way. It will be possible to continue the army structure No 4 because we will get about 500 slots and promotion positions. As regards the infrastructure, we will be able to begin the priority program to renovate barracks. We will be able to pay for the great arms systems. I cannot make any predictions today for the future. There could be a surplus of DM3 billion as well as a gap of DM100 billion--depending on how one calculates.

[Question] It seems to me, Mr Minister, that in the time prior to your taking over, expenditures for expensive armament were made rather carelessly. There was talk of negligent handling and observation of the DM billion projects. That is backfiring on you now, and you yourself mentioned organizational shortcomings in the Defense Ministry, announcing consequences. Naturally I am interested in the consequences, but also in the problem whether it would not be time now to discuss a firm opinion in the military, the opinion namely that the most perfect and complicated arms systems must be procured for land, naval and air forces. Doesn't one have to abandon that gigantism?

[Answer] One can certainly say in general that all the industrial nations of the Western world have reached a turning point. I do not want to mention Eastern Europe because the problems there are obvious to everybody. The times of opulence are over everywhere. Budget problems are visible everywhere, including in our own country. The consolidation of budgets is necessary, and this cannot leave the defense budget unscathed, although one must realize that if the general budget increases by some 4 percent and the defense budget, including personnel means, by some 6 percent, this is a clearly overproportional increase.

The arms systems ordered also in times of opulence are being supplied and financed, they must be financed. The ordered arms systems cannot be canceled. We need the general renovation of the Bundeswehr. One thing is correct, however: If the next arms generation is involved--the conceptional work for the nineties--one cannot continue in the future along the trends of the past. If we were to build a new tactical combat plane in the nineties according to the principles of the seventies--Tornado was planned in the year 1967--it would ruin the defense budgets of the nineties.

[Question] Mr Minister, Charlemagne, the German-French combat tank, is supposed to be built in the nineties. Will it be scratched? After all, something must be scratched. And how about the technical combat plane 90 and the following models of the ground-to-air missile Nike?

[Answer] As regards Nike, the direction we must take is more or less clear. I believe that in the end this procurement will have to be made in America. But when that will be, is not least a financial problem. The tactical combat plane of the nineties cannot be fiannced. According to a defense budget with current prices, we would have to make DM6 billion available for development purposes. We do not have that money, we cannot have it. It is not the task of the defense minister to implement industrial-political aims of the German aviation and outer space industries. In other words, those who want to have this plane for industry policy or political employment reasons must make the DM6 billion available; we do not have it. The plane of the nineties belongs to the arms concept of the nineties. One will need planes in those times, but whether one will need the same number of them, or whether their price will increase as before, I don't know. I have two question marks there. Then there is the German-French combat tank: Decisions have not developed so far that one could say the tank will be built. A considerable increase with regard to its combat value must take place. This problem is being examined at present.

[Question] But the federal chancellor promised this to French President Giscard in this summer's consultation talks.

[Answer] It has been promised that we will enter an agreed-on phase of studies. First, there is the necessary increase in combat value to justify expenditures. Second, all components we have today must be used; they would have to be built into the new tank. That means no new developments. Third, this project must be approved by the German Bundestag, that is by the Defense Committee, and I see the greatest problems in this respect at present. I consider the combat tank 90 issue--German-French production--a highly political and very important problem of friendship between these two nations, and with regard to cooperation as well. But prerequisites must be clarified first, and then one can aim for decisions. That will be possible only in 18 months.

[Question] Mr Minister, the Bundeswehr will hardly have enough personnel in the next years; one might not be able to cope with the need for personnel. So there could be a shortage of 100,000 young soldiers in 1985, of 12,000 noncommissioned officers and of 3,200 officers with an extended period of service time. There is a 30 percent deficit with regard to training personnel for combat and supply troops. Applications for officer's careers have decreased by 40 percent since 1978. It seems that the Bundeswehr is drying out not only financially but also with regard to personnel.

[Answer] The Bundeswehr has lived with an insufficient number of noncommissioned officers since its establishment. That is certainly not a satisfactory answer to a critical question; it is a statement. We live here certainly in a very difficult situation. If we prolonged the training times to enable the noncommissioned officers to cope with their duty in handling the conscripts, it would decrease the attractiveness. But if we eliminated the prerequisites, it could curtail the efficiency. We have decided at present to prolong the training time. It could entail an additional shortage of noncommissioned officers.

One must see all these trends as a whole. They are certainly alarming, but I am convinced that this will change in the next months. The whole thing is a communicable system, it depends on the labor market, on offers and demands on the work market. The wage structures of the Bundeswehr are appropriate. Payment in public service is good and that includes the Bundeswehr. You pointed out a second problem we will have to cope with in the second part of the eighties. It will not be the problem whether the Bundeswehr is attractive or not, it will be the problem of the generation with low birth rates, and we will make suggestions in time to solve this problem. Elements of these suggestions are already visible. In 5 to 6 years there will be a debate on the necessity to prolong the conscription time, not now but in 5 to 6 years.

[Question] To a total of 18 months?

[Answer] A political decision will have to be made on that. There is no reason why one ought to commit oneself today politically. There is the debate on volunteers, the service of women in noncombat units of the Bundeswehr with equal professional chances. Eventually there is the question of how personnel changes can be made to preserve the same combat strength of the Bundeswehr with less soldiers.

[Question] You are therefore in favor of assigning women to specific sectors of the Bundeswehr as long as they do not perform any service under arms as per article 12 A of the Basic Law?

[Answer] Yes, definitely, and these surveys will be continued. And in this respect I will not be impressed in any way by the protests, either; for it is an intolerable state that the Bundeswehr employs 47,000 women, with these women doing essentially what women unfortunately mostly do all the time, namely, cooking, cleaning, and operating typewriters, that is, typing. Why shouldn't a woman serve in the Bundeswehr in a leading position, always under the proviso that she will not be assigned to the combat units? It is hard for many conservatives to visualize anything of the sort. It does not come hard to me at all, and progressive people actually out of their own self-assessment should be all for a trial being blazed for women's emancipation in the Bundeswehr as well.

[Question] You said, Mr Minister, that the pay in the Bundeswehr was good. The Bundeswehr Association does not share this view at all. It says that the social needs of the soldiers are neglected. Being a professional soldier no longer appears to be an attractive job, meaning, for example, the burden of a long service period, frequency of transfers combined with social problems for the family, the children and their environment, and the increasing backlog in promotions and post assignments. Obviously this constitutes an insoluble financial problem.

[Answer] Associations of different professions have the mission of raising demands, and it is necessary to continue the process of a dialogue between those who bear the responsibility and those who raise the demands.

I do not ask anybody to underwrite the analysis of the social situation or the soldiers or to share that analysis. But, if we take a look at the facts, we will find that we increased quite a few bonuses in 1980, that we were able to introduce compensatory time for too much of a service-time burden--which cost DM150 million--that we made some headway in the promotion of the first sergeants; and that the pay structures in public service are not bad at all.

Certainly, the problem of the frequent moves remains. That can be reduced, albeit only within limits. Surely some reduction can also be made in the service-time burden. This must be accomplished on the spot. Quite a few things may be left alone as well. This will be subject to the closed meeting and the decisions made at this meeting. After all, this will also involve personnel problems.

What remains, finally, is the problem of promotion and assignment backlog. Unfortunately it will be but very small headway that we will make in this respect in 1981, we just cannot print the money. On the whole, the public service and thus also the Bundeswehr must realize that a great deal of unrest exists in the public, thinking that the public service costs a lot of money. I view the problems of the assignment backlog just as seriously as do the Bundeswehr Association and the inspector general. Only this problem, too, needs to be narrowed down, and what we then come up with is not tens of thousands of positions that must be raised but much smaller orders of magnitude.

[Question] What likewise is in line with the question concerning the attractiveness of the professions as a soldier is the defense will of young people, and this seems to be in rather poor shape just now. This is also reflected by the growing number of conscientious objectors, and the SPD/FDP really is having a hard time reforming the provisions for conscientious objection. The test of conscience abolished by the SPD/FDP in 1977 was unconstitutional. Shortly before the Bundestag elections 11 SPD deputies foiled a coalition bill in the Bundestag because they believed that it would have stipulated an examination of conscience again. But all parties want the reform. You, too, advocated it, and in so doing you demanded an extension of the civilian substitute service to at least 20 months because this would then really be a decision dictated by conscience. When will the new bill be forthcoming?

[Answer] As far as I am concerned this really is an open question. You have just about described the confusing game in parliament at the end of the last legislative period where two bills existed, one of the opposition and one of the coalition, and neither found the necessary majority for various reasons. What parliament--or to be more specific, the SPD Bundestag faction--now plans on doing is to narrow down by means of expert opinions the options which the verdict of the Federal Constitution Court leaves. I cannot assume that there will be an early reform of the law, and for this reason all that can be done is to try in the process of dialogue between the political forces in the Bundestag and the Bundesrat--the opposition and the coalition--to meet each other halfway. I do not want to disturb this process by rash utterances, not least because, first, it is not my task due to my ministerial post and, second, because all remarks by a defense minister unfortunately arouse the suspicion that he advocates a provision in order to have as few conscientious objectors as possible, which is absolutely wrong.

What matters to me is that we understand that to me, as an individual and as a Christian, conscience cannot be subjected to examination and that, therefore, solutions must be found which will do away with these tests of conscience, albeit within the framework of the prescriptions issued by the Federal Constitutional Court, and these are plainly evident to anyone.

[Question] Mr Minister, in connection with the discussion on the Tornado people said that the structure and workstyle of your ministry and the whole armed forces are not up to date anymore, wherefore it is necessary to set up a commission of representatives of the government, the parliament, and independent experts which should fundamentally review and change the existing concept of the structure, armament, and strategy of the armed forces. Chancellor Schmidt, too, has desired the council of experts.

[Answer] Well, I am not aware of what the chancellor has asked on the subject. I am aware indeed of what has been put in writing in the coalition agreements, and there it is written that I should report to the cabinet when, following the March meeting which we already have discussed, we will have sorted our conclusions for the forseeable future in such a way that political decisions will be possible--with the recommendations of the defense minister, of course. Beyond this we are facing long-term problems, for instance, problems of the arms concept. We have brought this up, and these problems definitely need to be examined and decided with the inclusion of expert knowledge. Yet expert knowledge in the first place means that the Federal Defense Ministry be in charge, and this, secondly, on the basis of the expert knowledge pooled there; after all, this cannot be done separately from the findings of the military men who still are the best experts. But if, beyond that, expert knowledge can be mobilized within the framework of these clear lines of competence, then I fail to see any reason whatsoever why it should not be employed. Freely floating commissions just are not any solution to the problem, and I stated my view on this matter publicly earlier.

[Question] Mr Minister, viewed against the background of the desired increase rate of a real 3 percent in the national defense budgets it is obvious that NATO evidently is turning into an alliance of different memberships, not only for this reason but also because the small NATO partners, or some of them, are failing to support correspondingly the dual decision of December 1979--the modernization of medium-range weapons with the simultaneous offer of arms control. Does this not expose the Federal Republic to the immediate danger of being pushed into a European leadership role which we cannot at all afford politically, and perhaps do not want?

[Answer] All the NATO states share in the support of this dual decision. After all, it was adopted unanimously, and there is no reason at all to doubt that all NATO states will also support this decision in the future as they are doing today.

[Question] Yes, but what about Holland and Belgium?

[Answer] What matters is not the share in the support of the decision. What is at issue is the question whether these two countries plan to approve the stationing of these weapons on their territories. Both states have asked for a respite, and I see no reason to assume that this respite will not be used in a favorable way. In any event, we will not be isolated because, regardless of the decision by these two states, Italy firmly is sticking to its promise so that we will not be plunged into any continental European isolation. The chancellor in his government statement made it clear once again that as far as we are concerned the dual decision with its two elements--attempts at arms control, negotiations with the Soviet Union on arms limitation for these Euro-strategic weapons but also our readiness to do our duty to restore the military balance--continues to be valid.

[Question] Yes, and what about this European leadership role which seems to be coming nearly inevitably since the Federal Republic obviously will have to bear a greater share and which is also desired by the Americans?

[Answer] This will not happen in the end. Surely there is a military-political and political difference between the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg and the Federal Republic. This simply emerges from the size and the special geographical location of our country. But we would not dream of letting us be pushed into a leadership position. Besides, this would not benefit either the alliance or the Federal Republic of Germany, neither in the West nor in the East.

[Question] Even if we do not interpret security policy so narrowly that it merely means defense policy, can we say: We are still ensured against war, but we are no longer adequately safeguarded against military pressure in peace--just look at Poland--even if we are not prone to blackmail? But is merely reacting all that the West can do?

[Answer] I think the assessment of our security policy situation inherent in your question is fundamentally wrong. Poland is in a situation which is entirely different from ours. We are part of the alliance. For this alliance we put up an intact army of 500,000 men which is well motivated and trained, which is ready for action. Within 72 hours we can increase it to 1.2 million West German soldiers. We are not prone to blackmail militarily, a reason why this will not even be tried.

What matters now is to comprehend that security, and thus also the continuation of detente policy in Europe, is possible only on the basis of a safe defense capability. Contributing to this end is my task, just as it is the task of the Federal Republic of Germany as a whole. Anyone fancying that we could be pilgrims between two worlds, that we could accept military inferiority and nevertheless continue living in the same world as before, is terribly mistaken. Balance is the precondition not only for peace but also for the continuation of detente policy.

SCHMIDT SENDS CONDOLENCES ON KOSYGIN DEATH

LD201848 Habmurg DPA in German 1704 GMT 20 Dec 80

[Text] Bonn, 20 Dec (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt has sent his condolences on the death of the former chairman of the Soviet Council of Ministers, Aleksey Kosygin, to Soviet party head Leonid Brezhnev and the chairman of the Soviet Council of Ministers, Nikolay Tikhonov. In the telegram, which was released in Bonn today, the chancellor says that he recalls Kosygin's constructive contributions to the development of relations between the Soviet Union and the Federal Republic and the openmindedness which he had always shown in the talks they had had.

GENSCHER ISSUES STATEMENT ON MADRID CONFERENCE

[Text] Bonn, 19 Dec (DPA)--At the close of the first stage of the CSCE followup conference in Madrid, Federal Foreign Minister Genscher once again emphasized that respect for human rights and basic freedoms is an important requirement for building political confidence. Genscher's statement, which was released in Bonn, goes on: "If detente is to be credible in the long run, people must profit from it directly." Genscher is at present in Prague. "The CSCE followup meetings are not tribunals," the statement continues. "But a critical discussion on the implementation of the provisions of the Final Act is necessary unless they are to remain a dead letter." It will not be easy to achieve concrete improvements in the field of human contacts and information during the second stage of the conference. This also applies to confidence building in the military sphere which will not be possible without the inclusion of the European part of the USSR. Nonetheless, the Western countries have entered the coming round with confidence.

SENATE SPOKESMAN ON GDR CUSTOMS REGULATIONS

[Summary] Berlin, 23 Dec (DPA)--Commenting today on reports that, in contrast to previous practice, the GDR is now charging customs duty on goods taken out of the country which had been purchased with the obligatory minimum currency exchange amount, Senat spokesman Hermann Meyn said today that the GDR has not introduced stricter customs regulations. The long-standing regulations are still in force, but it appears that in the past the GDR customs officials interpreted them more liberally than at present. According to the GDR customs regulations, goods and gifts up to a value of DM100 per person per day can be taken into the GDR without payment of duty, up to a maximum of DM500, even though the stay in East Berlin or the GDR is longer. Gifts and other articles up to a value of DM20 per person per day can be taken out of the GDR duty-free, up to a maximum of DM1,000.

FRANCE READY TO AID CHAD TRANSITIONAL GOVERNMENT

LD231319 Paris Domestic Service in French 1300 GMT 23 Dec 80

[Text] France is ready to help the Chad Transitional Government of National Unity. Requests formulated by Goukouni Oueddei are being examined with attention and interest by Paris, and in particular as far as aid for the reconstruction of Chad is concerned.

Francois-Poncet Statement

[Text] Speaking to the National Assembly Foreign Affairs Committee in Paris on Thursday, Mr Jean Francois-Poncet discussed France's stance in the Chadian conflict. Our country's behavior, he said, has been dictated by its respect for Chadian sovereignty. France has given help every time it has been requested to do so by the legal authorities. It ended its help as soon as the request was withdrawn. It is paradoxical, he added, to hear some people criticize France for its passive attitude after having heard them criticize it for its interventions, the minister added. This shows a complete failure to understand the French doctrine in such matters. France is willing. It will not impose its help. The minister noted that in the present situation France's intervention has not been requested by either side.

This attitude of respecting Chadian sovereignty is by no means synonymous with indifference. France has constantly supported the efforts made both inside Chad and at the initiative of neighboring African states, notably Togo, or in the OAU framework, to promote national reconciliation and a return to civil peace. It is continuing to lend its cooperation and humanitarian aid to the Chadian population wherever it is still possible to do so, the minister continued.

He specified that France, which refrains from any kind of interference, is anxious to express its condemnation when the conclusions of the Lagos conference are no longer respected by one of the states which took part in it. France understands perfectly, in this connection, the concern shown by the African states at what looks like a serious failure to keep the promises made. It will lend its support to any collective effort the African states take to restore peace to Chad, to preserve its unity and maintain its independence.

MARCHAIS REJECTS PROSPECT OF INVASION OF POLAND

[Excerpts] Georges Marchais was the chief guest on Radio Luxembourg's "Surprise Newsreel" on Saturday, [13 December], relayed live from Lannion. Answering the first question from journalist Elie Vannier concerning Chad--following Giscard d'Estaing's warning against pursuing an intervention in that country by armed foreign elements--the Communist candidate said: "Giscard d'Estaing issues a warning to himself, because hitherto it has mainly been France which has intervened in Chad's domestic affairs." Georges Marchais stressed that it is up to the people of Chad to resolve their own problems, without France interfering.

The "Surprise Newsreel" headline carrying Senator John Glenn's remarks about the strong probability of the Soviets intervening in Poland before Tuesday prompted a vigorous response from the Communist candidate.

Georges Marchais: I do not believe that there will be an intervention in Poland. Every day since August, when the events in Poland began, for the past 4 months people have been promising a Soviet intervention the next day.

This intervention has not happened. On the contrary, the Soviet leaders have on several occasions expressed the clear and unambiguous stance that it is up to the Polish people themselves to settle their own affairs. This is why I do not believe at all--I repeat, not at all--in such an intervention, and I refuse to consider the hypothesis.

Michele Cotta (Radio Luxembourg): The PCI's second-in-command stated officially the other day that he would break away from the Soviet Union in the event of an intervention in Poland. Enrico Berlinguer told Vadim Zagladin the same thing 3 days ago. Would you have anything to say to the USSR leaders in the event of an intervention? We are merely hypothesizing.

Georges Marchais: Basically we are being criticized for not taking the same stance as our Italian comrades. Well, I am going to be very frank with you: It is absolutely out of the question for us to do so. This is clearly because, being jealous of our independence, we do not intend to align with any party; not with the PCI nor any other party, not even the CPSU. However, to be more precise there are three essential reasons why we will not do so:

First, because we consider that there is no justification for the campaign being waged on the alleged danger of a Soviet intervention in Poland. Since the events began, the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] leaders, the Soviet leaders and the leaders of the Warsaw Pact member countries have constantly--individually or together--clearly stated that it is up to the Polish people themselves, their government and their Communist Party to solve the problems their country is now experiencing. That opinion is shared by the PCF, as I explained myself at the L'HUMANITE festival in September.

Second, I think that in acting as they are--since you have asked me this question--our Italian comrades are not really taking account of Poland's real interests. Allow me to explain: They are in fact helping to make people believe that a foreign threat is hanging over Poland. In my opinion, by so doing they are not making our Polish comrades' task any easier. Quite the reverse, they are making it more complex and more difficult to implement what I would call the necessary process of democratic and socialist reform decided on by the PZPR and the Polish Government to solve their problems and make progress. Moreover, that explains why the PZPR, the trade unions and even the bishops have protested against the campaign to dramatize the situation being waged in the West. I understand them because there is no doubt that the social, economic and democratic measures which Poland now needs cannot be implemented easily. Of course, they correspond to the aspirations of the vast majority of the Polish people. However, it is obvious that these measures are meeting with resistance, delays and vacillation at various levels. The Polish leaders must take twofold action: First, they must overcome the residual dogmatism among those who are resisting the necessary changes; second, they must defeat those who would like to take advantage of a difficult situation to effect a regression in Poland. In these conditions I would say that taking part in the alarmist campaign of deception about the alleged threat of a Soviet intervention is--whether you like it or not--encouraging both dogmatism and resistance to socialist reform, and also those who do not want socialism to be strengthened in Poland. I repeat therefore that adopting our Italian comrades' stance means complicating our Polish comrades' task and not taking account of Poland's real interests.

Third, how can anybody fail to see that such a campaign favors the plans of all those who want to revive the dangerous and ruinous arms race, to try to scuttle international detente and to further align Europe's capitalist countries with Washington?

Those are the main reasons why we French Communists are adhering strongly to our stance: "It is up to the Polish people, their government, the PZPR and them alone to carry out the reforms announced which will--we are sure--enable them to overcome the problems and help strengthen socialist Poland. We are confident, and we wish the PZPR every success in carrying out this task."

That is our stance. It is consequently--I repeat this--out of the question for us to align with any stance adopted by any party whatsoever.

Radio Luxembourg: Do you think that the Polish people, the PZPR and the Polish Government are going the right way about restoring, shall we say, a situation of calm and cohesion in the country? Might you have some advice to give them?

Georges Marchais: I will certainly not do so because, you see, I am not one of those who talk constantly about noninterference in the internal affairs of fraternal parties and who give advice every day, every morning, about what should be done.

Radio Luxembourg: So much for the Italians!

Georges Marchais: So much for all sides! So much for everybody! I will tell you quite calmly: The PCF does not accept and would not accept that any party whatever should tell it what it should do to serve the interests of our people and our country which we love.

I will add something else: It is absolutely out of the question for us to open discussion or issue communiques on the situation in Poland with any party whatever. It is important to know what you want. If you want the Polish people, the workers, the PZPR and the Polish Government to settle their own affairs themselves, they must be allowed to do so, and you must stop trying to give them advice.

Radio Luxembourg: You really seem convinced that there will not be a Soviet intervention in Poland. Have you received assurances from the CPSU, your Soviet counterpart?

Georges Marchais: I am convinced that there will not be a Soviet intervention in Poland, period.

Radio Luxembourg: In you book, "Hope for the Present," you say: "I spoke one day about the need to keep your eyes open, well! We are keeping our eyes open, wide open and all the time." Are you sure that you have your eyes wide open now with regard to Poland.

Georges Marchais: Very wide.

Elie Vannier: Mr Marchais, you are a candidate in the presidential election. You have issued 131 proposals and are holding 70 meetings, but there is one question which people often ask: Suppose you hold second place among the leftwing candidates after the first round--will you step down in favor of the leading leftwing candidate?

Georges Marchais: The hypothesis on which I am working, the goal for which I am working with my party, is to place the PCF candidate in the lead on the left in the first round.

The Communist candidate added: "It is in the interests of the workers and all those who want change, real change. The problem we are facing, in view of our country's deep crisis, is not to discuss individuals in an abstract way like that. The fundamental question is what policy will be implemented to steer the country out of the crisis, in other words to end unemployment and inflation and solve the major problems which have not been solved in Giscard d'Estaing's 7-year term: housing, education, and health in particular. Is France or is it not going to play the role it should play in moving toward the new world economic and political order which we were discussing before?"

Georges Marchais then demonstrated that the present government does not have an adequate political majority to implement the damaging policy which is encountering opposition from the class organizations which the French workers' movement has: the PCF and the CGT. "In this situation, the French bourgeoisie, with Giscard d'Estaing, wishes to extend its political foundations and draw the PS. I would like to point out that the PS has already gone a long way on this path since--and this is no secret to anybody--specific agreements have been concluded between the RPR and the PS. The fundamental question for the first round therefore is, on the one hand, to erect a barrier to their desire to aggravate the situation and, on the other, to prevent this new holy alliance between the right and the PS from being sealed. Consequently the party which must win is the party which is continuing the battle for union and real change: the PCF. You would like me to discuss the second round, but it is the first round which is decisive!"

One journalist then asked, but with whom?

Georges Marchais: On the basis of our experience this is what we say: We must achieve a majority movement of all those men and women who are opposed to the present policies and who want change. Second, we need an aware majority movement, in other words the men and women who want change must be inspired by the idea that, without fundamental democratic reforms, there will be no change in this country and we will not end the crisis. Hence my 131 proposals, 4 objectives and 3 means. All our activity, all our action is therefore aimed at uniting the men and women who stand to gain from this change.

Elie Vannier: Outside the parties?

Georges Marchais: No! Not outside the parties. I would like to point out that at our party's 23d Congress we strongly reaffirmed that we wanted a majority movement and the leftwing union. However, we want to create a balance of forces which is likely to prevent the PS from being able to decide at will, as it did in 1977, to break and abandon the Union of the Left and the Joint Program, which prevents the PS from taking the path of cooperation and collaboration with Chirac as is now the case--Chirac who in 1977 was described as a fascist by the PS leaders, especially the leaders of the Center for Socialist Studies, Research, and Education. Today, as you saw during the recent by-elections, there are arrangements and connivance between the PS and the Chirac supporters.

MITTERRAND'S STANDING IN ELECTION POLLS RISES

[Text] Paris MATCH publishes an opinion poll conducted by Public S.A. on 8, 9 and 10 December surveying 1,000 people: Giscard d'Estaing would be reelected in the second round by 52 percent of the votes (as against 57 percent in November) compared with 48 percent (as against 43 percent) for Francois Mitterrand. In the Public S.A. "barometer" in which Mr Rocard was mentioned for the last time (in other words in October) as a possible adversary for the present head of state, he received 49 percent of the votes (as against 51 percent for Giscard d'Estaing). According to the different hypotheses given, in the first round Giscard d'Estaing obtains between 30 and 34 percent of the votes, Mitterrand between 23 and 27 percent, Marchais 17 percent, Chirac between 12 and 13 percent, Debre between 5 and 10 percent, an ecologist candidate between 6 and 9 percent, Mrs Garaud between 4 and 6 percent, an extreme left candidate between 2 and 3 percent and the extreme right candidate 1 percent. If the president of the republic did not stand and if Mr Barre were a candidate, the premier, credited with 12 percent of the votes, would be outstripped by Mitterrand (27 percent), Chirac (19 percent) and Marchais (18 percent). In the second round he would be defeated with 34 percent as against 66 percent for the PS first secretary.

LIBYAN ENVOY ASSESSES 'PROFITABLE, CORDIAL' VISIT

[Unattributed report: "Ash-Shahati: Progress in Italian-Libyan relations; talks at PCI headquarters with Comrades Bufalini, Rubbi"]

[Text] Rome--During his 3 days in Rome, Ahmad ash-Shahati, the Libyan Government's foreign liaison secretary (in practice one of the Jamahiriyah's two foreign ministers) has had lengthy conversations with his counterpart Emilio Colombo and with representatives of the major Italian parties.

Yesterday he provided an initial assessment of this visit, described as "profitable and cordial": at a press conference at the Grand Hotel Ash-Shahati answered several questions from Italian and foreign journalists. The foremost topic, of course, was Italian-Libyan relations, but it was not the only one: other subjects discussed were the Middle East, the Palestinian issue, the crisis in Chad, Egypt and the United States. The Libyan Government representative provided exhaustive answers predominantly characterized by realism and tranquillity.

With regard to the "hot spot" in Chad, he said: "We are supplying aid and technical assistance laid down in a treaty with that government. I know nothing about the presence of Libyan soldiers." On the Palestinian issue he said: "Israel is the aggressor; we are defending the rights of the victims of aggression...." On relations with Malta he said: "We have reached an agreement to refer our disagreement to the court in The Hague. There is a shared desire between Libya and Italy to guarantee the island's neutral status."

According to Ash-Shahati, as far as relations with Italy are concerned, this visit has indicated encouraging progress in the political field and with regard to economic cooperation. But can Italy describe itself as the Jamahiriyah's "special" partners? "A special relationship," he replied, "is composed of specific agreements--relations must be mutual. In any case, Italy plays a leading role in economic exchanges with my country." This is a fact; in the first half of this year Libya supplied Italy with 55 percent of its energy requirements.

Within the framework of relations between the PCI and the People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriyah Congress a meeting took place yesterday at PCI Directorate headquarters between Ahmad ash-Shahati, foreign liaison secretary of the General People's Congress, and (Ammar Taggazi), secretary of the General People's Committee in Rome, and the following comrades: PCI Directorate member Paolo Bufalini, Central Committee member and foreign section chief Antonio Rubbi and foreign section aide Remo Salati. During the cordial conversation, an exchange of information and opinions took place on the situation in the Mediterranean with special reference to the Mideast issue and the Palestinian problem and on Italian-Libyan relations, in which connection the desire was expressed to consolidate and develop them in the interests of both countries and both peoples. Both sides also agreed on the necessity and usefulness of intensifying relations between the parties.

L'UNITA PLEADS 'RESPONSIBILITY' IN STAND ON POLAND

LD221447 [Editorial report] Rome L'UNITA in Italian 14 December 1980 carries an unattributed report headlined "Marchais' Criticisms of PCI Over Poland" on remarks made by the PCF secretary general in a 13 December interview broadcast by Radio Luxembourg, followed by the following unattributed commentary:

"Anyone who has read and assessed the stances adopted by the PCI in connection with events in Poland is well aware that the Italian Communists have neither participated in nor assisted campaigns of any kind.

"In all its declarations, the PCI has always expressed solidarity with and support for the Polish Communists, the Polish United Workers Party and its leadership group in their difficult task of regeneration and in their battle to prevent the prevalence of disruptive phenomena in the country. We therefore believe that our position has been and still is characterized by a great sense of responsibility and balance. In this connection, the alarm and concern that we have expressed and the consequent steps that we have taken seem more than legitimate and well-founded, in view of the attacks and 'campaign' tones that have appeared especially in the Czechoslovak and GDR press and which have been echoed in part by the Soviet newspapers. Moreover, this concern and alarm are all the more legitimate in view of the fact that the hypothesis of a foreign intervention in Poland has never been rejected by those who should do so; nor, furthermore, have there been any principled pronouncements against the very hypothesis of an intervention."

L'UNITA: POLISH QUEST 'NO ATTACK ON SOCIALISM'

[Unattributed commentary: "Only Real Kind of Aid"]

[Text] The Polish crisis has reached another very difficult situation, a crucial moment, We do not need to say much to express our full concern. Poland cannot, must not, suffer any outside interventions or acts of force. Such an eventuality, inconceivable in principle, would have disastrous effects not only on that country but on the very idea of socialism, the future of the democratic forces in Europe and throughout the world and the prospects of international detente and cooperation. The PCI could not fail to draw all the conclusions.

From the very outset we have expressed this assessment with the utmost clarity, and again recently we deliberately emphasized it by making official demarches with respect to the Warsaw Pact communist parties. Poland, its leaders and its citizens have a right to carry out their own experiments, to take their own decisions and to wage the necessary political struggle against antisocialist elements with full responsibility and sovereignty. Of course we are not questioning obligations attributable to membership of international alliances and military pacts. We are not unaware of this reality of the blocs, to eliminate which it is necessary to work with tenacity and determination. Nor are we ignoring the pressures, maneuvers and bids at interference on the part of reactionary forces.

It is certain, however, that no pact or international tie can be invoked and brought to bear to impede the development of a political and social process if it has deep roots and motivations in Polish society, economy and culture--in short, in Poland's historical reality. This is the essential political issue posed by the Polish situation. In that country there is a great need for reforms--primarily economic, but also political reforms of ossified political structures incapable of reflecting the needs and thrusts of a complex society. For some months a quest has been underway for ways of responding to this major problem of reform--difficult but vital--with very varied contributions, with the unsettled but tenacious and courageous commitment of the Polish United Workers Party and its leaders, and with an extraordinary participation of the masses, characterized by the strong involvement of the workers.

There are dangers and risks, of course, as always when there is a desire to make significant changes. They are the risks of anarchy, of the evasion of responsibilities in the face of the conflicting demands of an economy in a state of crisis. But how are they to be fought if not by demonstrating in practice the "reformability" of the Polish system and by demonstrating that the Communist Party is not an obstacle to, but the leader, the wisest and most far-sighted leader of such a task?

Only thus can it be demonstrated that in Poland the nation's future coincides with the future of socialism. Therefore, we are convinced that nothing would be more shortsighted than to stubbornly regard the quest for and definition of a form of socialism different from the kind tried hitherto as an attack on socialism. This is not so. It is the guarantee of imparting a new impetus to it, it is the precondition for regaining the consensus and involvement whose absence helped to cause the present crisis.

The realization of this by allies and friends is the most lofty and true form of aid that can be given to Poland. Therefore, we are very concerned, as we are about all threats of armed intervention. But we are also concerned because we believe that even the mention of the mere hypothesis of an intervention is in itself an unacceptable restriction on sovereignty.

PCI'S BUFALINI EXPLAINS PARTY POSITION ON POLAND

[Unattributed report on PCI Directorate member Paolo Bufalini 16 December report to PCI Central Committee: "Lesson of Polish Crisis"]

[Text] Comrade Bufalini has delivered a report--of which we publish an account--to the Central Committee on Polish events, explaining the PCI's stances and demarches in recent weeks vis-a-vis other communist parties. Bufalini pointed out that in the past few days there have been a few elements of improvement, possibilities of dialogue and signs of a convergence of wills with a view to avoiding dangerous outcomes and facilitating positive political solutions, which would constitute a major step forward for Poland. These elements of improvement are the result of the responsible attitude of all the protagonists in the events. The major peaceful demonstration at Gdansk and the character which it assumed seem to confirm these hopes, following a phase of harsh tensions.

On the one hand we must guard against alarmism, which is being nurtured by international and internal anticommunist forces with openly propagandist or deliberately provocative aims. This, Bufalini said, is something quite different from the firm stance which we adopted on the eventuality of a military intervention. This possibility has been discussed both by the Central Committee information chief of the Polish party itself and by the press of other communist parties and socialist countries. We believe that our stance has had a positive and constructive effect, within the limitations of our ability to exert an influence.

So, while it is right not to succumb to alarmism, on the other hand, as we are witnessing signs of an improvement, it is necessary to guard against exaggerated optimism. Indeed, the situation remains very complicated and difficult.

Bufalini pointed out that the main issue now lies not in "predicting" whether there will be any interference or pressures with more or less manifest outside support, but in knowing what everyone can do to contribute to a positive political solution of the Polish crisis. Indeed, there must be a realization that the stakes in Poland are of historic importance.

The three principal protagonists--the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR], Solidarity and the Catholic Church--now seem to be converging in a constructive effort of both moderation and regeneration. But to gain a clear picture of the framework within which this effort is being made, and to understand the significance of the assessments and anxieties expressed by the PCI in recent weeks, it is necessary to take into account certain essential traits of the Polish crisis.

Referring also to information received during recent meetings with PZPR representatives and exchanges of opinions with other communist parties, Bufalini summed up these traits as follows:

1. The working class is the protagonist of the movement that is shaking Poland. This was not the case with the 1956 events in Hungary or the 1968 events in Czechoslovakia, though behind the dissatisfaction in those countries too there was an opposition stance or a thrust on the part of the working class. Nevertheless, in those cases it was other social groups, intellectual strata, which came to the forefront--and in Czechoslovakia a considerable section of the apparatus and of the party leadership cadres. In Poland, 700,000 workers including the miners of red Silesia, went on strike in August alone.

2. The immediate causes of the movement are to be sought, according to what the Polish Communists themselves have told us, in the serious economic and social situation. There has been a decrease in labor productivity, a major imbalance between levels of production and consumption, and the foreign debt reached $20 billion (it is now rising to $24 billion because of accumulating interest) and there was a shortage of essential consumer items. To deal with these difficulties there was, as is known, an attempt to cut real wages, and in August the decision was taken to increase meat prices by 75 percent. That was how the protest movement exploded. Those decisions were the last straw. But the Polish comrades themselves refer in their own analyses to deeper-seated structural and political reasons. One of the fundamental errors which they indicate is the economic approach pursued during the seventies, the option of rapid industrialization, with a concentration of investments in basic industries and the sacrificing of agriculture (the peasants could not obtain fertilizers or agricultural machinery) and the food and construction industries. On top of this, there were the problems stemming from an unplanned mass exodus from the countryside to the cities (about 1.5 million people). All this was accompanied by degenerative political and social tendencies--major imbalances in pay, privileged situations and phenomena of corruption. In the past, there was the background of an official ideological approach, with an atheist component and restrictions on religious education which conflicted more and more glaringly with the capillary and mass influence of the Catholic Church and its broadly exercised de facto--but not institutionally organized--freedom of expression. The Radom and Ursus revolts of 1976 were an alarm bell which went unheeded.

So in the present movement we are witnessing something deep-rooted which has been brewing for some time. Already trade union freedom and the freedom to strike are taking shape in a more properly institutional and political sphere. On top of this there are explicitly political demands.

We are witnessing a deep-rooted tide, which is the result of a reaction long held concealed in view of the restriction of freedoms--a tide reflected partly in disorganized and anarchic forms, in which socioeconomic motivations are linked with a widespread religious feeling, an awakening of national awareness and the manifestation of a deep-seated feeling among the Polish people partly colored by nationalist currents.

This deep-rooted tide, as we know partly from the PCI's exchanges of opinion, is acknowledged by the Polish comrades and partly also by the Soviet comrades. This is why the PZPR Central Committee did not opt for a repressive policy. There is essentially an acknowledgement of a demand for regeneration, though there is a tendency on the part of other communist parties to enclose it within the institutional schemes of socialist countries.

3. There is therefore a need for a democratic regeneration of socialism. In Poland there is now the recognition of an autonomous trade union, which is reckoned to include several million workers, including hundreds of thousands of communists; and there has been a major change of regional and peripheral leadership cadres (involving about 500 people) and the replacement of 11 out of 15 PZPR Politburo members.

4. In this situation, inevitably, there are conspiracies and attacks against the socialist character of Polish society and Poland's international position as a member of the Warsaw Pact; in the present phase of international relations and European balances these must definitely be repelled, primarily in the interests of detente and peace, which are also preconditions for a future elimination of the blocs.

Bufalini stressed that the stance adopted by the PCI proceeds from the fact that it is necessary to acknowledge the overall positive character of the movement that has developed in Poland in recent months, inasmuch as it is directed toward a necessary regeneration, as long as all the protagonists, all the forces wishing to guide it in the right direction, prevent it from driving itself into an abyss, thus causing upheavals in the heart of Europe that would threaten world peace itself. [sentence as published]

As well as these general assessments, Bufalini said, in our conversations with the Polish comrades we pointed to the need for the workers movement to be directed toward a larger share of economic and political responsibility, taking into account the difficult phase being experienced by the country's economy. We decided to express our support for the policy announced by Comrade Kania again at the recent seventh Central Committee plenum and summed up in the formula of "regeneration without anarchy." At the same time we confirmed our definite opposition to all forms of foreign intervention and every act of military force.

Bufalini pointed out that with regard to "regeneration without anarchy" it is of course possible to find differences with other communist parties. Following a long suppression, it is not surprising that the democratic aspirations of broad people's masses are emerging initially partly in turbulent events (demonstrations which must definitely be transcended through a steadfast political approach of democratic and national responsibility). Nor must every dissenter be considered an enemy of socialism. Indeed, we believe that the Communist Party can only play an effective role through the recognition of a pluralism which exists in practice in Poland today. The enemies of socialism, who certainly exist, can only be combated politically and isolated by standing at the head of the regeneration movement and by proceeding from the basis of full, clear and explicit national independence.

Taking these assessments as its inspiration, the PCI Directorate has drawn up with the regional secretaries a stance on the events in Poland to be discussed with the entire party and has also carried out demarches vis-a-vis the other communist parties concerned to make this stance known to them and to confirm that it would consider any form of military intervention unacceptable.

We have certainly not nurtured alarmism, as some people have tried to allege. Bufalini pointed out that an authoritative Czechoslovak Communist Party leader, analyzing the Polish events as a reflection of maneuvers on the part of "imperialist subversive centers," cited some weeks ago the 1968 Soviet military intervention as a demonstration of a "wise and far-sighted policy." Furthermore, the 1968 "fraternal assistance" was evoked by PRAVDA at the same time as the entire Solidarity trade union was described as antisocialist. Additionally, early in December the PZPR's official spokesman announced that "if the state and socialism are in danger, Polish Communists will have a duty to try in every way to protect the country from tragedy--even to request help from our friends and neighbors...." This is why we decided to make known the demarches that we have carried out against possible future military intervention, which would constitute a real tragedy with very serious and unpredictable consequences.

While the new elements of improvement encourage our hopes of a political solution to the Polish crisis, our outlook must nevertheless remain cautious, bearing in mind the remaining obstacles to an orderly regeneration process.

Bufalini listed among the positive elements the considerable economic aid granted to Poland by the USSR, with a currency loan of $1.5 billion, the essential prudence being maintained by the Western powers and the constructive attitude of the Polish Episcopate--all the more significant following Wyszynski's visit to the pope.

If the possibilities of a positive political solution are consolidated, Bufalini said in the final part of his report, and the self-governing trade unions ratified, if new forms of democracy which, if well governed, could have a positive influence even in other socialist countries are established, we will be witnessing a very important innovation. In any case, the party must be informed about and must debate these topics so as to provide answers to legitimate questions and just demands, to deal with and resolve certain erroneous stances and examples of defensive stubborness which are emerging, albeit within a general and profound consensus with the line adopted--all this within the framework of imparting a new thrust to our entire action for international solidarity with peoples struggling for freedom, democracy and social progress against imperialist and reactionary forces and of the struggle for detente and disarmament, particularly in Europe.

FREITAS DO AMARAL CALLS FOR STRONG GOVERNMENT

[Text] "Form a government as strong as possible and organize it with a view to its being long-lasting," is the opinion expressed by Freitas do Amaral in statements to the DIARIO DE NOTICIAS. The Social Democratic Center Party [CDS] chairman confirmed his decision not to remain in the government "for the sake of consistency," while explaining that he will continue to struggle for the Democratic Alliance and for its strengthening, since, he said, "I am changing my post, but I am not changing my struggle."

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Is your decision not to take part in the next government being confirmed? Does this mean that you may not support it?

Freitas do Amaral: I informed my party's national council yesterday that I confirm my decision not to remain in the government. I am doing so, above all, for the sake of consistency. I am true to my pledged word, and I am certain that Francisco Sa Carnerio would do likewise, if he were alive. In addition, I believe that this stance on my part, contrary to what has been said, will facilitate the next government's efficient operation.

Of course, I appreciate the countless expressions of support and sympathy which I have received from the CDS, as well as from the Social Democratic Party [PSD] and the Popular Monarchist Party, urging me to reconsider my stance. But the decision has been made, and I will not change it. I should also explain that I will not abandon the struggle. I am changing my post; I am not changing my struggle. I will continue to struggle for the Democratic Alliance and for its strengthening.

As far as the government is concerned, since it is a Democratic Alliance government, it will have my support, as long as it maintains the necessary loyalty to the Democratic Alliance's blueprint, just as, specifically, Sa Carneiro and Amaro da Costa understood and implemented it.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: What is the CDS' official stance on the choice of the new prime minister--Dr Francisco Pinto Balsemao?

Freitas do Amaral: The CDS has always stated that the decisive word in the choice of the next prime minister rested with the PSD, so the CDS respects the choice which has been made, which fell upon Dr Francisco Balsemao. I have had excellent personal relations with him for many years, and this will certainly facilitate the necessarily very close relations between the PSD and the CDS both in the government and at other levels. The CDS National Council merely regretted that the decision made by the PSD was a decision for which the PSD was exclusively responsible, instead of a decision shared also by the Democratic Alliance's other partners. Be that as it may, this will not affect the Democratic Alliance's solidity, nor does it rule out the CDS' participation in the government or the support which the CDS will give the government.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: You were the first person to assert the need for an "institutional cooperation" between the president of the republic and the government. Would you care to enlarge on your thinking? Do you believe that it will be possible?

Freitas do Amaral: When I speak of "institutional cooperation," I mean that there must be cooperation between two institutions within the framework of their respective powers, but there should be no subservience or resignation on the part of the government when confronted with possible interference or obstacles on the part of the president of the republic. Since the task of governing rests constitutionally with the government and not with the president of the republic, it is more likely for there to be lack of cooperation on the part of the president with the government than there to be lack of cooperation on the part of the government with the president. This is what has happened in 1980, without the government or the prime minister being to blame.

That is why the CDS National Council stressed in its conclusions that it rests with the president of the republic to accept and continue institutional cooperation with the government. For its part, the latter will have to maintain a stance of firmness and independence with respect to the president, without prejudice to the necessary loyalty. The Democratic Alliance's blueprint does not coincide with General Eanes' ideas and intentions, but it is the Democratic Alliance which must govern and so should not relinquish its blueprint, nor must it reconcile it with the presidential strategy.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: How do you view the Democratic Alliance's future?

Freitas do Amaral: I regard as essential the continuation and strengthening of the Democratic Alliance, both as a national blueprint for building the democratic state, modernizing Portuguese society and real social justice, and as a party coalition, parliamentary majority and government.

The Democratic Alliance is a necessity of the present time; it is the force which the Portuguese people chose and confirmed in 1979 and 1980, and it is therefore our duty to maintain and strengthen it. Over and above this, the Democratic Alliance is one of the principal aspects of the political legacy of Sa Carnerio and Amaro da Costa. It must be respected and fulfilled. I will be intransigent in this line of defending and strengthening the Democratic Alliance, and I have hope in the future.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: Do you advocate the formation of a strong government for 4 years or, on the contrary, opting for a "weak" government merely for a few months or a year?

Freitas do Amaral: This matter was also broached by the CDS National Council. Our opinion is that as strong a government as possible should be formed and that it should be organized with a view to its being long-lasting; this is for three reasons: because this was our election promise, because this is what the national interest requires and because if we deliberately sought to form a weak government, it could happen that we would not even reach the point of having the opportunity to replace it with another, stronger, government.

DIARIO DE NOTICIAS: What are the CDS names which can already be regarded as certain or likely to belong to the next government team?

Freitas do Amaral: No name is certain for the present. As is well known, the government can be formed only after the prime minister has been officially appointed by the president of the republic. On the other hand, I have already received full authority from the CDS National Council and Executive Committee to take all the steps and make all the decisions on the part of the CDS concerning the next government's structure of composition. So I will probably discuss this with Dr Francisco Balsemao. Until then all speculations will be permissible, but they will be no more than mere predictions.

CUNHAL: EANES ELECTION 'EXTRAORDINARY' VICTORY

LD191055 Paris L'HUMANITE in French 15 Dec 80 p 12

[Correspondent Antoine Acquaviva interview with PCP Secretary General Alvaro Cunhal: "Setback to Dictatorship, How? Why?"--date and place not specified]

[Excerpt] [Question] In Portugal, elections are being held one after another, but one never resembles another. After its victory in August, the right was defeated in December. How can this reversal be explained?

[Answer] After obtaining a majority in the parliamentary election in October, the reactionary parties thought that their candidate was certain to win the presidential election and so they disclosed more details of their objectives and of their plan to liquidate the democratic regime.

The danger from fascism is clear. The election of Eanes essentially signifies a popular vote, opposed to the plan for the total takeover of political power by reactionary forces, and against the danger of a new dictatorship. The election result is a very serious defeat for the reactionary forces and is a great victory for democratic Portugal.

[Question] It is a paradox to have a government of the right and a president elected principally by antifascist forces. Is it possible to overcome this duality of power, and if so by what means?

[Answer] The constitutional and political aspects of the situation must be considered. At the constitutional level, the provisions of the constitution allow this situation to exist, paradoxical as it may seem. The difficulty can be overcome if the government and the president keep within their own spheres of authority and take into account the interdependent and complementary nature of their functions. At the political level, and in the present situation, things are not as easy as that. Before the election the reactionary parties in the government wanted to take over all power; they contested the powers of the president of the republic; they "amde war on the president"; they sought to "overcome the duality of power" by giving the presidency of the republic by their own candidate, Soares Carneiro. The election of President Eanes (with communist votes) has caused the collapse of a fundamental element in the reactionary forces' plan for subversion. Consequently, in our view there should be, or there could be another solution to the paradox: the reshaped government should submit and defer to the legality of the constitution in its policy and in its actions.

[Question] What repercussions could the departure of Mr Carneiro have on relations between the ministerial coalition parties on the one hand and between the Social Democratic Party [PSD] and the Socialists on the other?

[Answer] Prime Minister Carneiro was head of the counterrevolution and reactionary forces; it was he who inspired and directed the destabilization strategy and the subversive plan to liquidate the democratic regime. His death represents a serious loss to Portuguese reaction. Disputes, differences and rivalries are inevitable both between the parties and within each of the parties which comprise the ministerial coalition. It is the elements of the situation which must be considered. As to relations between the Socialist Party [PSP] and the PSD, there is the danger, especially from Mario Soares, of a new alliance between the PS and the right. Contrary to the official PS position, it is known that Mario Soares opposed the candidacy of Eanes, thus favoring the reactionary parties' candidate. Alliances with the right are a consequence of his policies. We have yet to see what his attitude will be to the new situation created by reaction's defeat in the presidential election, but it may be said that the recent contest has brought Socialists and Communists closer together. We are making efforts to strengthen these ties and to foster cooperation, joint cooperation, joint action and unity among all democrats and patriots.

[Question] The Communists have obviously played a role which might be termed decisive in impeding the attempt to restore an authoritarian regime. In the present situation, what are the objectives to which they are directing their efforts?

[Answer] That is indisputable; the PCP has played a decisive role in the struggle which resulted in the defeat of reaction in the presidential election and the setback to the reactionary plan to restore a new dictatorship. We are not saying that our party scored an electoral victory, but we do consider that it chalked up an extraordinary political victory. Our efforts will in the future be directed toward the firm defense of workers' rights, freedoms and other revolutionary gains of the democratic regime and the constitution. We operate strictly within the framework of democratic legality; in close liaison with the working class and the people's masses. We shall utilize all the freedoms and rights enshrined in the constitution to create conditions conducive to a turn in the Portuguese political situation.

DEFENSE CHIEF WARNING ON BUDGET LIMITATIONS

LD240921 Copenhagen BERLINGSKE TIDENDE in Danish 21 Dec 80 part 1 p 6

[RITZAUS BUREAU report: "Defense Forces Short of Money"]

[Text] Danish defense could be so hard hit economically next year that it would not be possible to meet the installments on the F-16 aircraft, meaning the defense forces would have to ask for an extension until 1982, Defense Commander in Chief General Jorgensen has announced. He also said that it might be necessary to make further manpower reductions at the end of 1981. The planned reductions would be a result of the Folketing's approving the so-called zero solution, which would entail continuing with the 1980 defense budget unchanged into 1981 but adjusted to the cost of living index. The zero solution would also mean that it is unlikely that there will be a special grant of 60 million kroner, which Denmark is to pay to joint NATO commitments. Next year Denmark is to pay 130 million kroner in all to so-called infrastructure work within NATO.

STORTING COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS STOCKPILING ACCORD

LD240915 Oslo ARBEIDERBLADET in Norwegian 18 Dec 80 p 5

[Text] The Storting Defense Committee has given its unanimous support to Storting approval of the agreement between the United States and Norway on the contingency stockpiling of military equipment in Norway. The issue will be discussed in the Storting in the middle of January.

In its recommendations the committee stressed that such stockpiling does not conflict with Norwegian base and nuclear policy. There have been arrangements in the past for stockpiling allied equipment which have taken full account of these policies.

It is a government condition that the stockpiling of allied material will be under Norwegian control and maintenance and will not required allied military personnel to be stationed in Norway in peacetime. The committee stressed this and also pointed out that neither nuclear nor chemical weapons are to be stockpiled.

AFTENPOSTEN VIEWS NORWEGIAN POLICY VIS-A-VIS USSR

[Nils Udgaard article: "Empty-handed to the Kremlin?"]

[Text] Does this fall's debate here in Norway on foreign and security policy, and the many demarches from various quarters in the Labor Party, mean that the foreign minister will begin his first Moscow visit next week with only the remnants of a Norwegian policy vis-a-vis the USSR? The question can be raised and thus gives some hint of the answers: even if we avoid definite "yes" or "no" answers, it is clear that the demarches have an effect on central parts of Norway's policy and negotiating platform with regard to our great neighbor in the East. Here Norwegian politicians are now faced with two crucial tasks--firstly to behave in such a way that Norway will be taken seriously as a real negotiating partner in Moscow, and secondly to shape a broad long-term Soviet policy with strong political foundations in Norway.

Long periods pass between official Norwegian-Soviet foreign minister visits. Frydenlund will only be the third man in Moscow since Trygve Lie had his dramatic nocturnal confrontations with Vyatcheslav Molotov in the Kremlin in the fall, 1944. The Russian pointed at the map, at the Dardanelles and at Oresund, and said that the Soviet Union was closed in here. Only in the north did the country have an outlet and it would not accept any disturbances there in the future, as had happened during the war. If this could be arranged the question of Soviet security would be solved once and for all, he said, and proposed that the Spitzbergen area be changed so that Norway and the Soviet Union would jointly rule over the island group. In his memoirs Lie has described how "someone" later tried to steal his notes, which he had taken to bed with him at his hotel.

Behavior was very urbane when Halvard Lange visited Moscow in 1961; 5 years later John Lyng had almost 1 week with the Kremlin leaders, and was given new proposals for a "guaranteed neutrality" for Norway. The Russians' foreign minister for the last generation, Andrey Gromyko, has not been to Norway since 1963; it was his turn this time, but he wanted Frydenlund to come to Moscow instead. The government agreed.

In reality Norway has been the object of a long diplomatic boycott by Gromyko. During the 15-year period in which the northern regions assumed a growing strategic importance at the same rate as the Soviet fleet buildup, the number of points of contact between the Soviet Union and Norway grew. The question of a demarcation line in the Barents Sea was raised and remains unresolved; different zones, white and "gray" were established and meet the north; fish resources dwindled and must now be shared. A tough tug-of-war is now going on to see who really will rule on Spitzbergen. The question of the control of the zone around Spitzbergen is highly controversial; Jan Mayen, too, has acquired a zone, which has been the subject of special talks with the Russians. Norwegian military activities, modernization and troop deployment are a major theme of tough and frequent Soviet attacks.

Moscow's obvious and legitimate goal is to push Norway in the direction of the status of "guaranteed neutrality." Not by our leaving NATO but by Norwegian politics being tied by so many limitations and restrictions, that we approach such a status in practice. The Russians have given strong backing to an agreement on regular political consultations, and then Gromyko would grace Oslo with a visit. Here Norway has been on its guard. Consultations are good, but an agreement that they will take place would give the whole business a new political perspective and could weaken Norwegian freedom of action in a crisis situation. The Danes entered into such an agreement in 1976, but they, unlike the Norwegians, have few bones of contention with the Russians and in addition their EEC membership provides further cover.

How then is Norway to meet the two decisive challenges in our relations with the Soviet Union?

Real negotiations: Since 1974 Norway has been in a classic negotiating situation with the Russians, about a demarcation line in the north. But real negotiations, with "give and take" based on a mutual desire for a solution, have not taken place. We have had shadow-boxing and Soviet attempts to manipulate the framework for the negotiations. In dealings with the Foreign Ministry, where the Russians meet professional, thoroughly prepared opponents, nothing has happened. Instead Moscow has tried to push the matter onto politicians like former Law of the Sea Minister Jens Evensen, with a basic foreign policy approach different from the official Norwegian view. The Labor party chairman and deputy chairman have been frequently received in Moscow.

The Russians' behaviour toward Norwegian politicians regularly reveals a didactic, sometimes a blustering and not seldom a threatening approach as a great power would behave now and then toward what it regards as a client state.

We remember the sharp attacks on Prime Minister Odvar Nordli during a jubilee reception in Helsinki 3 years ago; in the conflict over the flight recorder after the Hopen accident the following year there were even tougher measures behind the scenes; and we have the "missile diplomacy" in the controversial zone in the north. After Soviet research vessels had taken seismological profiles of the continental shelf along the coast in what was to be the Norwegian zone, the Norwegian ship, Seisarch, entered the disputed area in June 1976 to do the same. But the Norwegians had to leave quickly, for the Russians made an immediate announcement of protracted missile exercises in this very area.

Firm demands for formal equal treatment, clear and forthright answers from Norwegian ministers to unfounded Soviet attacks and threats, a coherent coordination of Norwegian policy toward the USSR--these are the preconditions for entering into real negotiations with Moscow.

A long-term Soviet policy: Here the Norwegian authorities are faced with two dilemmas which cannot be circumvented, but which require decisions. First, Norwegian political goals in dealings with the Soviet Union must be listed in order of priority, that is, what is most important among fishing, the demarcation line, natural resources on Spitzbergen, and the continental shelf. Second, we must decide to what extent we want to bring other nations', especially our allies', political weight into the picture. Can problems which to a very large extent are dependent on relations to a superpower be solved in isolation from these relations? By offering independent Norwegian jurisdiction do we not tempt the Russians to continually demand that Norway show greater independence from its allies and thus to further weaken Norway's negotiating position?

Just such a weakening has taken place this fall, for Norway has indicated clearer independence from its allies than at any time since 1949: a) the contingency stockpiling affair amounts, because of the way in which it was dealt with and the side effects which were caused, to a net weakening of political ties toward the West; b) the proposal for a "Scandinavian" nuclear-free zone, not expressly defined, reinforces Norway's special status within NATO; c) the idea of a form of cooperation between the small states in NATO has been launched at the highest level in the Labor Party and could create two "classes" of alliance partners; d) as far as nuclear policy is concerned the defense minister seems at least verbally to be drifting away from the thesis that in a crisis situation Norway too could be defended by nuclear arms; e) without having established any tangible organizational contacts with the EEC nations' foreign policy cooperation large sections of the Labor Party are swinging away from priority for the U.S. connection to a "European alternative," which in fact is nonexistent for Norway today.

All this points to a development in the direction of neutrality, even though this is a long way from the Russians' "guaranteed neutrality." However, for them the important thing is that this development should take place in Norway of its own accord. The cleverest thing they could do is to wait and see what happens in the future, and this would weaken or remove the reasons the Kremlin had for entering into negotiations with Norway here and now. It is for this reason that it is right to ask the question whether today we only have the remnants of a Norwegian policy vis-a-vis USSR.

The postwar unanimity on foreign policy is in the process of disappearing on a few important questions, and after a possible change of government next fall the opposition Labor Party would show even less resistance to neutralist ideas, and this would make it even more difficult to resurrect national unity. And in such a case patience would continue to be the Russians' safest card in negotiations with Norway.

In a statement after the meeting, Atakol said that subjects taken up during their first meeting were reassessed. Pointing out that he had brought up the issue of the Turkish Cypriot proposals on Maras [Varosha], which were leaked to the Greek Cypriot press in violation of the secrecy cause of the intercommunal talks, Atakol said that he had told the UN secretary general that this stand of the Greek Cypriot side cast a shadow over the current intercommunal talks being held in Cyprus. Atakol added that he had asked the UN secretary general to sharply warn the Greek Cypriot side.

Atakol left New York for Turkey today to participate in the talks to be held between President Rauf Denktas and Turkish Government officials in Ankara.

I AVYI REPORTS POLICE CHANGES; U.S. INVOLVEMENT

AT221240 Athens I AVYI in Greek 21 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] Insistent reports yesterday indicated the government intends to remove three leading police officers, specifically, Lemonis, Laos and Raftopoulos, chief, Athens police director and security forces chief, respectively. In the meantime there was a startling revelation of details about the existence of a destabilization plot centered on Washington. Even leading personalities of the Greek secret services did not exclude the possibility that such a destabilization plot exists.

According to the most prevalent estimate the plot, among other things, aims at:

--Promoting Greek U.S. negotiations on the bases, which are now in progress, and primarily at returning [U.S.] control or at least "joint control" over Greek secret services.
--Assisting junta sympathizers in their efforts to "lead" the Averof section of New Democracy or, at worse, to force a "total turn" toward the extreme rightwing of the ruling party.

The activation of this staff destabilization plot goes back months. At that time, specifically, information was fed to Greek secret services according to which leftist groups directed by the secret service of an Eastern countri acting with the tolerance, as stated, of the dogmatic KKE had planned a series of destablization activities for the fall and winter of 1980. In practice however, the U.S. secret services had already prepared efficient junta sympathizers (and common thugs) who were earmarked as leading elements for terrorist activities.

For the Americans, another equally important target was to offer "voluntary services" to the Greek services in order to help them solve such terrorist actions.

In this way the Americans believe that they will be able to restore the status prevailing prior to 1974 in relations between U.S. and Greek services with the use of official liaisons (instead of unofficial liaisons to date), with official "mutual exchange of information," with official "mutual visits" and so forth. Restoration of this form of relation has a special importance for the U.S. secret services.

In the meantime it appears that the Americans and junta sympathizers did not even hesitate to conscript people of the mafia who, among other things, are specialists in dynamite incidents and abductions, in an effort to promote their plans.

'OCTOBER 80' GROUP THREATENS MORE SABOTAGE

AT231620 Athens MESIMVRINI in Greek 23 Dec 80 pp 1, 2

[Reportage: "Provocative proclamation by the 'October 80' group with multiple threats; coordinated security measures in the shops; no progress in the arson investigations"]

[Excerpts] After its telephone calls to newspapers, the "Revolutionary Group October 80" [quotes as published] sent a written proclamation to at least two newspapers in which it "ideologically" defines its responsibility in writing for the arson it committed at the "Minion" and "Katranzos" shops. The proclamation was sent through the mail in an envelop bearing a typewritten address and was, like others which have preceded it in similar terrorist circumstances, typed (without mistakes but at the same time without any special attention to the typing).

The text of the proclamation sent by the Revolutionary Group "October 80" [quotes as published] to at least two newspapers is as follows:

"With two incendiary bombs we struck at the businesses Minion and Katranzos, in Havtia [area where the two shops are situated].

"What Are These Retail Businesses

"The products which are produced by the proletarians in the places of their forced labor are taken over by force by the master-owners. These products pass into the hands of the owners of the shops in order to be sold on the market, so that in the form of merchandise they may produce profits. The retail businesses have concentrated thousands-millions of products in their warehouses, their display windows and within their area generally. Some of these are useful products, absolutely essential for the needs of the proletarians and all those who are exploited while others are useless and unnecessary which, however, are enforced as necessary (through daily brainwashing, through advertising, through enforcement of false values etc.) so that sales can be increase and so that they [the masters] may get back the sum total of the workers' income (the basic essential is to meet the needs of the masters so that they can "expand the national economy"). There are also other products which the proletarians cannot afford to purchase and which are only destined to meet the needs of the privilaged of this society (master-owners-leading personalities-merchants and so forth).

"They sell these products at prices which they themselves fix (under the laws of their "free" economy). Thus over and above the profit (supervalue) received by the masters--the industrialists, craftsmen--the ones who suck the workers dry in the places of their forced labor, the merchants also profit. Commercial profits are loaded upon the consumer. The prices of these products--merchandise--also incorporate profits as well as the costs for advertising and operation of luxury shops and so forth. In this way we can see, for example, that a woman worker at the factory produces 10 dresses during 8 hours (under the exhaustive rates of work enforced by the masters). With the daily wage she earns she needs 3 to 4 day's pay in order to purchase 1 dress (from those which she herself has made). The remaining 39 dresses which she produced during four 8-hour periods do not naturally go to meet raw materials and installations [sentence as published]. A high proportion goes into the pockets of the industrialists and the merchants.

"Many of these shops are directly connected to the production of the good they sell, in other words they are the commercial branches of industrial complexes (as for example, Katranzos, Lambropouloi, Tsitsopouloi and so forth. No matter whether they are connected to an industry, however, or whether they are "independent" commercial enterprises, they remain a basic part of the economy of the masters. They undertake to sell the products which the masters have stolen from the producer-proletarians.

They are the official receivers of stolen goods of the system, they are only a part of the process; capitalist production, theft of the products by the masters, marketing (in the form of merchandise), so that they can get back whatever they gave to the proletarians in the form of salaries.

How These Retail Businesses Operate

"Like every other business, they rely upon the exploitation of the proletarians. There are thousands of workers in them, in the warehouses, in processing, transportation and sales. The masters exploit the need of the proletarians for an income in order to live and for this reason they crush them under the daily wage, under deprivation and misery (because the proletarians have not yet discovered--in their majority as a class--other methods to help meet their needs).

"Conditions of work within these areas are exhaustive. In the warehouses they load and unload tons every day, in sales there is endless standing with breakfast snatched standing up, all day long, smile on their faces, to serve the customers (you are not permitted to have your own problems your own disposition--the 'personality' of the shop comes above all else). Over your head there is the entire hierarchy of terror (personnel directors, section chiefs, those in responsible positions, directors, appointees, stooges, 'colleagues' and so forth), who watch to see whether you do your job well, whether you sit down or break your neck in order to serve, and so forth.

"Even with the use of closed circuit television, with appointed stooges, with stooges who work as employees, they follow every move and police all areas watching both the employees and the customers in case they 'steal' anything, in case they acquire some of the things they need without paying the price set by the masters, in other words without giving back what they received in the form of a salary. (Despite all this, however, more and more find ways to take what they need without paying for it to the owner-exploiters. The shop owners themselves admit that 'escaped profits' amount to hundreds of millions each year).

"For all these reasons we have decided to strike at Minion and Katranzos which are only two--of the dozens which exist--vast retail businesses.

"Through this action of ours, like all our practice to date (acts of revolutionary violence and clash, in every possible way, with the regime and its supports) we want to help break the disorientation which all the establishment forces are trying to enforce ('rightist' or 'leftist' or 'revolutionary') upon those who are being exploited and oppressed. This is a disorientation which is being attempted under the theory: All this will one day belong to us and we will take it all when the system changes, but, until it changes we can do nothing else except 'fight' for democracy and development; in other words, we must allow the system to function and continually increase its sovereignty and power. We on our part want to demonstrate our own theory which is: In order to overthrow this system, the regime of exploitation, of terror and of misery must be destroyed first. We must daily raise obstacles to its function, we must prevent implementation of the decisions of the masters. We must increasingly gain the possibility of deciding and of enforcing our own decisions in actions about the fate of what we ourselves are producing.

"We must liberate whatever we need, taking it from the masters.
"Whatever we cannot or do not need to liberate we must destroy because its only usefulness lies in providing profits for the masters, the owners.
"We must strike at the masters and their tools.
"We must actively deny the legality and the values of the society of the masters.
"Revolutionary violence cuts down their potential and their time.
"Underground action--with the weapons in the hands of the proletarians and all those who are being exploited."

EVREN SAYS RELIGIOUS FANATICS WILL BE CRUSHED

TA231914 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1600 GMT 23 Dec 80

[Excerpt] Head of State Gen Kenan Evren has issued a message on the 50th anniversary of the martyrdom of Kubilay by usupers of religion in Menemen. In his message, General Evren said that (?respect) for the freedom of religious beliefs is guaranteed by laws in Turkey.

Kubilay, who was serving as a NCO, and nightguards Hasan and Sevki were martyred by Dervish Mehmet, a religious usurper, in Menemen on 23 December 1930. A ceremony was held in Menemen today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of Kubilay's martyrdom. In a message he sent to the ceremony, General Evren said: The [word indistinct] heads of the canonical system dared to plot against the existence of our young republic 50 years ago today. However, they were disappointed as a result of the timely intervention of Kubilay and the nightguards who were loyal to the republic and the Ataturk principles. This country has been able to crush many fanatical incidents with the help of its vigilant forces. Many such examples can be cited from our recent history. The distorted voices that have been heard from time to time have always been silenced. One should not doubt that such voices will continue to be silenced with the same determination in the future as well.

Noting that the system in Turkey distinctly separated state from religious affairs, General Evren said: Everyone should know and understand this reality. He added: Religious beliefs should always be respected. Religious beliefs and the freedom to worship are guaranteed by laws in our country. Our people are now well aware of the aims of those who wish to distort this reality. The lofty Turkish nation is more than ever determined to defend our secular republic and the revolution and principles of our lofty leader, Ataturk. We, as a nation, once more commemorate Kubilay and nightguards Hasan and Sevki, the defenders of the Ataturk principles and the untainted children of this nation, express our gratitude and pray for them.

[Text] Bonn (DPA)--In a telegram today to his American opposite number Edmund Muskie Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher stressed the German people's solidarity wih the American citizens in connection with the continuing hostage affair in Iran. Genscher pointed out that the 52 American hostages are for the second time having to celebrate Christmas cut off from the outside world and separated from their families. Genscher went on to stress: "You and the American people can be safe in the knowledge that this Christmas the Germans share your feelings, your hopes and wishes."

BOELLING COMMENTS ON STATE OF RELATIONS WITH GDR

[Text] Bonn, 28 Dec (DPA)--State Secretary Klaus Boelling, the next permanent representative of the Federal Republic in East Berlin, has expressed Bonn's interest in continuing the dialogue with the GDR Government "since we Germans, according to past experiences, have a special duty regarding peace." In an interview for West German and North German Radio, Boelling recalled on Sunday that such a duty, even if defined differently in the GDR, "is seen in this light also by the GDR leadership, by Council of State Chairman Honecker." Boelling stressed that Germany is keen to see to it that along with recognition of the principle of nonintervention and recognition of the GDR's sovereignty, there will also in the future "be something holding the nation together." Bonn is prepared in the interest of this objective "to accept a few polemical blows, even a few polemic-propagandist hits below the belt."

The former government spokesman, who is to succeed State Secretary Gaus in East Berlin, expressed the view that the present moment is "not suitable" for a meeting between Chancellor Helmut Schmidt and the GDR council of state chairman, but this "surely does not" mean that the idea will be dropped. Boelling said that the GDR was already aware when signing the Basic Treaty that certains demands such as the recognition of GDR citizenship and the transformation of the permanent missions into embassies--something to which the GDR has recently drawn attention--"cannot be accepted by us, and the situation has not changed."

GOVERNMENT, POLITICIANS CONDEMN BORDER SHOOTING

LD272342 Hamburg Domestic Service in German 1800 GMT 27 Dec 80

[Text] The Berlin Senate has strongly condemned this morning's incident involving the abortive escape attempt of a man, aged about 20, from the GDR to West Berlin ending in a hail of bullets fired by GDR border guards. The West Berlin police stated that GDR soldiers fired shots and a burst from an automatic pistol at the man, who had already reached the so-called "death strip" adjoining the border opposite Spandau Borough. Shortly afterwards he was taken away in a GDR People's Army ambulance. The CDU/DSU has also condenmed the new border incident. Its expert on inter-German affairs, Von Wrangel, called on the Federal Government to protest in Berlin and to raise the matter at international conferences.

Government 'Shocked'

LD272344 Hamburg DPA in German 1950 GMT 27 Dec 80

[Text] Bonn, 27 Dec (DPA)--The Federal Government has, in the words of a government spokesman, been shocked by the news that GDR border authorities have again used firearms against people. Nothing could justify this endangering of human lives. The Federal Government again refers to the urgency of the appeals by the three powers that the GDR should change its border practices, the spokesman said.

FOREIGN MINISTRY DENIES SECRET EC MIDEAST PEACE PLAN

[Text] Bonn, 28 Dec (DPA)--The Foreign Ministry in Bonn has denied press reports according to which the European Community, in a secret Middle East peace plan, demands the complete withdrawal by Israel from all occupied Arab territories. A Foreign Ministry spokesman told DPA on Sunday in reply to an enquiry: "There is no peace plan by the Ten. Furthermore, the Nine have not fixed definite dates for the withdrawal." The member states' attitude had been explained "clearly and unequivocally" in the statements by the Council of Europe in Venice (Nine EC countries) of 13 June 1980 and in Luxumbourg on 2 December 1980 (nine EC countries plus Greece).

The Belgian evening paper LE SOIR had reported on Saturday that in the alleged secret peace plan the EC demanded the complete withdrawal by Israel from all Arab territories, including east Jerusalem, witin 2 years. The plan, meant to be a European contribution toward solving the Middle East crisis, had been endorsed by the Community's heads of government in Luxembourg on 2 December.

PRESS ASSESSES IMPACT OF AFGHANISTAN INVASION

[Press review on Afghanistan problem]

[Text] NEUE RUHR ZEITUNG writes: Afghanistan was the ice-cold exploitation of American helplessness in view of the taking of hostages in Tehran. It was a move by the Soviet Union in the direction of the Indian Ocean. One year has passed without anything changing about this situation, neither with regard to the U.S. hostages in Iran, nor the existence of the Kabul satellite regime. Carter's grain embargo as well as the Western boycott of the Olympics did not expel the Soviets from Afghanistan, but at the other end of the enormous Red Empire, the worldwide condemnation of the Afghanistan intervention may have helped the Poles. Even the Kremlin could not afford or did not want to pay the price for having tanks roll across the border twice in 1 year.

NEUS OSNABRUECKER ZEITUNG states: The most urgent warning signal for the Kremlin was the anti-Soviet demonstrations in Tehran. The hostage affair created the impression for months that all the aversion of the new regime was directed against the world power United States. But that impression has been corrected by the storm at the Soviet Embassy and the outbreak of hatred against Iran's northern neighbor. The heralds of the renaissance of Islam consider the common religion as the strongest link with the people of Afghanistan. Every power obstructing this community of Islam is being outlawed. The Tehran incidents show all of a sudden that anti-Americanism there does not mean being pro-Soviet, says NEUE OSNABRUECKER ZIETUNG.

BADISCHE ZEITUNG of Freiburg concludes: It belongs to the great disappointments of 1980 that the United States, despite hopeful developments could not think of anything better than a return to intervention policy, namely the announcement of the Carter doctrine for the Persian Gulf. The most important result of the Afghanistan adventure, which the Soviets never assessed realistically, however, was the introduction of a rapid and threatening deterioration of East-West relations, making cold war today more likely than a policy of reason and dialogue.

GOVERNMENT NOT TO CONTRIBUTE TO EC EXTRA BUDGET

NC241852 Paris AFP in English 1836 GMT 24 Dec 80

[Text] Paris, 24 Dec (AFP)--The French Government said today that it will not contribute to extra expenditure voted by the European Parliament. In a statement, the cabinet severely attacked the decision by the Parliament's President Simone Veil to give final approval to an extra European Community budget for 1980 and the budget for 1981. Mrs Veil is a former French Cabinet minister. The statement said that the French Government could not accept that the Treaty of Rome on which the Community is founded "should be so manifestly diverted from its object." The statement added that the proposals approved by the Parliament "gravely endangers the normal working of Community institutions and affects correct functioning of budgetary procedures, which rest on cooperation and confidence between the Council of Ministers and the Assembly which share budgetary powers."

PAPERS COMMENT ON REAGAN CABINET NOMINATIONS

LE MATIN Dispatch

LD291019 Paris LE MATIN in French 18 Dec 80 p 8

[Henri de Bresson dispatch: "Reagan Surrounds Himself More With Administrators Than Ideologists; Main Portfolios of Republican Cabinet Now Distributed"]

[Text] Washington--Gen Alexander Haig's nomination as secretary of state has roused no comment in the East, though certain Western and Middle Eastern countries, like Egypt, are rejoicing. A Moscow spokesman simply said that it was a question of "internal U.S. administration business." In London, Foreign Secretary Lord Carrington says he is "personally delighted" at this appointment. But the real question is posed by the New York TIMES, which considers that "Americans have the right to know where General Haig is going to lead them and by what means."

Ronald Reagan's future government is now known in outline. The four main portfolios are now allocated. Since last week the names of the future secretaries have been known: Caspar Weinberger, defense; Donald Regan, Treasury; William French Smith, justice. The last appointments expected will complete a team whose thoroughbred conservatism does not detract from Ronald Reagan himself but has more in common with the members of an important company's board of directors than a government of ideologists. None of the main Cabinet members is reputed to have a very clear line. Caspar Weinberger is primarily an efficient administrator. Rather than outlining grandiose options, his task should essentially be to make the U.S. Army once again an efficient tool. For many months now the numerous shortcomings of this army have been an object of constant concern both for the men and the military themselves, with the main problem being that of the recruitment of qualified personnel.

Donald Regan especially is prepared to bring order back into the house, that is, to set the internal economic machinery in motion once more. He has refused to give anything away on this point and his ideas are far from coinciding with those of the young lions of the Republican Party, one of whose main representatives--David Stockman--has been entrusted with the post of director of the Office of Management and Budget.

In this team Alexander Haig is not really out of place. The former White House chief of staff and NATO commander in chief has no particular reputation for originality in the sphere in which he will be called on to exercise his talents. "I do not think he has a strategic concept of the world. He is a gifted administrator, not an ideas man," one of his close collaborators admitted. In the foreign policy sphere Alexander Haig has exercised his talents in particular in relations with the Soviet Union and Europe. Favoring a firm line toward Moscow, he should be if not a subtle then at least a tough interlocutor for the Kremlin, and he is counting on the Europeans to help him in this task.

The former NATO commander has managed to develop numerous relationships in Europe which he intends to use to improve the cooperation which he deems indispensable. It remains to be seen whether he will be able to operate with tact in his new post--the tact which was sometimes lacking during his years in Belgium. It also remains to be seen what repercussions his very fixed concepts on the Soviet danger will have on his Third World policy. Nobody has ever heard General Haig express any particular ideas in this sphere, no more than in the economic sphere. And it will doubtless be necessary to know more about his staff in order to throw more light on this.

The choices made by Ronald Reagan in general correspond to one of the main campaign promises: to give back to America a quiet confidence in its own strength. His administration has all the appearances of a serious team of administrators unwilling to be carried away by ideological whirlwinds. But if things did get out of hand it is still difficult to see which way they would be pulled.

L'HUMANITE on Haig

[Jean-Emile Vidal article: "A General and Chairman at the Head of Diplomacy: Alexander Haig is Chairman of a U.S. Firm--One of the Best Provided With Pentagon Billions"]

[Text] As from 20 January next, U.S. foreign policy will be the direct responsibility of General Alexander Haig, Reagan's designate as secretary of state. We cannot infer from this that Mr Haig, former commander in chief, NATO Forces Europe, after being White House general secretary at the time when Mr Nixon was in need of a trusty friend to try to ride out the Watergate scandal, will determine Washington's foreign policy.

The subject "is too serious to be entrusted to a military man," and U.S. big business circles prefer to take it on in order to make sure that their interests will prevail over other considerations. They will not find much trouble in getting through to Mr Haig, who after a military career which led him from Japan to Korea, from Europe to Vietnam, from Europe back to the United States, has in his turn become a man of "big business" by assuming the presidency of the United Technologies Corporation in 1979. This is promotion in gold for a retired general, since this president's salary is estimated at $500,000 (Fr2,300,000) a year.

Big U.S. industrial enterprises are engaged in arms production to a greater or lesser extent. This explains the nuances--rarely the differences--between the firms' managements. Now it happens that United Technologies ranks third among U.S. firms on which the billions of dollars of Pentagon arms orders are showered.

It comes just behind General Dynamics and McDonnell Douglas and last year received over $2.5 billion of Pentagon orders, mainly for its Pratt and Whitney fighter engines, Sikorsky helicopters and MX missile command and control facilities.

This means that the future U.S. Secretary of State, even after having resigned--temporarily--from the presidency of United Technologies, will inevitably remain tied to a firm directly interested in production of conventional arms and strategic missiles with nuclear warheads; a firm one-third of whose procuction is sold to the Pengagon and which is certainly not agitating for a reduction in the military budget but rather for a renewal of tension which would engender an increase in arms orders.

General Haig already distinguished himself back in 1976 by his interventions in France's internal affairs, when for example he publicly declared himself opposed to the Communists entering the government. During the Republican Party convention last July General Haig distinguished himself further by criticizing the policy of detente and security with the socialist countries and by proposing to replace it with another policy including the concepts of reciprocity and force.

Though it is probable that the future incumbents of the White House and the other big posts in the U.S. administration will endeavor to maintain a very high level of arms spending--Mr Caspar Weinberger, the Pentagon chief appointed by Reagan, is also proposing a buildup of military potential--it is certain that the U.S. leaders will not be able to ignore the economic and social crisis which is hitting ever broader sectors of the population and that they will discover limits to their ambitions.

Moreover the United States is not alone and no longer lays down the law in the world. The Soviet Union has recalled that it is ready to discuss reciprocal disarmament which would not upset the balance of forces and consequently peace and security. Beyond the inflammatory slogans roused by the election campaign it is to be hoped that Reagan's future administration understands this language of reason.

PCF DISSIDENTS LEAVE PARTY, ISSUE STATEMENT

[Text] Mrs Helene Parmelin, a writer, and Mr Edouard Pignon, an artist, have decided to leave the PCF (LE MONDE, 19 December). They published the following statement on 18 December:

"We are leaving the PCF after a very long political opposition battle. Our political and social concepts and our fight for a free socialism have now become incompatible with membership, even in opposition, of the PCF. An increasing number of Communists are realizing at this moment the party's dangerous true nature in most fields of national and international life. As for those who, by their silence or for electoral reasons, believe themselves bound, despite everything, to support Marchais' party, unlike us in Stalin's time they will not even have the terrible alibi of ignorance."

L'HUMANITE announced the departure of Helene Parmelin and Edouard Pignon in six lines in its Friday edition. The PCF daily recalls that these two members "had long been expressing their profound disagreement with (PCF) policy in numerous press organs."

POPE SENDS CHRISTMAS LETTER TO POLISH PRIMATE

LD252110 Vatican City in Polish to Poland 1915 GMT 25 Dec 80

[Letter from Pope Paul II to Cardinal Stefan Wyszynski, primate of Poland, on the occasion of Christmas]

[Text] Esteemed and beloved primate:

I wish in connection with the coming feast of Christmas to address to your eminence special greetings for the church in Poland and for all my compatriots. These are primarily wishes for domestic peace, which our whole fatherland so badly needs after the difficult period of recent months. During these months the whole nation--especially the groups of working people on the one hand and representatives of the authorities on the other--has shown great maturity by taking important steps and gradual decisions dictated by mutual esteem and a sense of the common good.

I was able many times to be convinced of this by the recognition given, and still being given, by people all over the world and by entire nations to what happened in Poland from August to 10 November this year.

Following this difficult period, Poland primarily needs peace to be able to consolidate social life in an atmosphere of mutually restored trust and to alleviate the extensive shortages, especially in the sphere of the national economy.

This year was a very difficult one from the economic point of view--not only for industry, but also for agriculture--because of natural disasters, unfavorable weather and delays in work.

If all the nations in the world, particularly those on the European continent, have the right to live and develop in peace, then Poland has a special right to this. During the last war Poland did not spare her blood and the lives of her best sons and daughters. She paid for this right with the lives of about 6 million people, to say nothing of the terrible devastation of the country, its resources and cities, primarily Warsaw. Therefore, there exists in the world the correct conviction that security and balance on the European continent are lined with the recognition of Poland's sovereign rights, won at such great cost.

Thus, looking in the direction of Bethlehem, which every year reminds us of the right of all people of good will to peace, it is this peace I wish for all my compatriots, for my fatherland, and for the church in Poland, the church which so many times in history has confirmed her links with the nation and has done so again.

I address these wishes to Your Eminence and to the whole Polish Episcopate, together with hearfelt blessings. I break the Christmas wafer with everybody in my fatherland at the Christmas Eve supper.

[Signed] John Paul II, pope.

KIPRIANOU ANALYZES VISIT TO LUXEMBOURG, UK

NC241344 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1130 GMT 24 Dec 80

[Text] President Kiprianou has described his visit to Luxembourg, Britain and the talks he had with the governments of the two countries as useful from every point of view. Kiprianou said that during his meeting with Luxembourg Prime Minister Werner, both he, the prime minister, and Foreign Minister Flech showed great understanding both for Cyprus' efforts to secure better terms, from those of the past, to export Cypriot products to the countries of the Community as well as for the Cypriot problem.

Regarding his meeting with British Prime Minister Thatcher, President Kiprianou said that he briefed her on the latest developments in the Cypriot issue and asked her to support UN Secretary General Waldheim's efforts to find a just solution to the Cypriot issue. The president continued: Thatcher considers--and it is supported by all--that the next phase of the intercommunal talks will be critical and will determine future developments. In general, he added, there is an impression that we have surpassed the exploratory stage in the intercommunal talks and what is expected by all is that we will now enter the substantive part of the dialogue, where it will show whether there are really prospects for finding a solution to the problem in the framework of the dialogue that is being held.

The president of the republic stressed again that from our side, as in the past, every possible good will should be shown. What we expect, he added, is that the necessary response will also be shown from the other side.

Regarding the Cyprus-EEC relations, President Kiprianou said that during his meeting with Thatcher, he asked her to support Cyprus in its efforts to secure better terms for the export of Cypriot products to EEC countries. He also said that he is planning to visit other Common Market countries during the new year, something that was officially suggested to him.

Referring to his meeting with the leader of the Social Democratic Party and former FRG Chancellor Brandt, President Kiprianou said that he gives special importance to this meeting, and added that Mr Brandt continues to play a very serious role both in his country's affairs and those of Europe's in general. Kiprianou said: There is no question of Brandt mediating the Cypriot issue, but only a question of supporting and strengthening the UN secretary general's efforts for a just solution to the Cypriot issue.

Regarding his contacts with the Cypriot community in London and its representatives, President Kiprianou said that the community is very strongly interested in Cyprus' struggle. He concluded: The Cypriots in Britain, despite the geographical distance and the difficulties they encounter, try in every way to help and contribute to the promotion of the struggle of the Cypriot people.

LISSARIDHIS REAFFIRMS EDEK INTERCOMMUNAL POLICIES

NC281950 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 28 Dec 80

[Text] In party meetings in Larnaca and Limassol, EDEK Chairman Lissaridhis has said that the deinternationalization of the Cypriot issue is taking place systematically. Lissaridhis reiterated his party's opposition to the striking off, as he said, of the Cypriot issue from the UN General Assembly's agenda as well as the issue of the missing persons from the special committees. He also said that false sensations are being created regarding the intercommunal talks, and that withdrawals were made from the 1977 proposals.

The EDEK leader also said that all patriotic forces should rally together on one line that would secure the eradication of the occupation; safeguard all citizens' rights; and provide for the right of all refugees to return to their homes; unity, sovereignty, territorial integrity, nonaligned policy and the dissolution of all war bases and [foreign] presence in Cyprus. Lissaridhis also referred to economic problems and said that the country needs a radical change.

DENKTAS RETURNS FROM TALKS WITH TURKISH LEADERS

[Text] President Denktas has said that he reached an agreement with Turkish Government officials that the Cyprus problem should be solved through the intercommunal talks. Denktas, who included his official contacts with Turkish Government officials in Ankara, and the delegation accompanying him returned to the island last night. In a statement at Ercan [Tymbou] Airport upon his arrival, Denktas said that during his talks with Turkish Government officials, the intercommunal talks were ap[illegible]sed in depth.

Denktas noted that the other side should also make an assessment and be sincere about the establishment of bizonal federal system respecting the cofounder rights of the Turkish Cypriot side in order to secure peace in Cyprus as soon as possible. Pointing out that the Turkish Government will as always guarantee and protect the security and existence of the Turkish Cypriot problem in any future agreement, Denktas noted that the purpose is the establishment of a system that will prevent the annihilation of the Turkish Cypriot community under Greek hegemony. Denktas added that he returned from Turkey with very good news concerning economic issues.

DENKTAS COUNTERS KIPRIANOU REMARKS ON TALKS

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that if Kiprianou wants a solution within the framework of the principles reached with Makarios and which Kiprianou (?claims) to support then he should not close his eyes to the realities.

Denktas this morning replied to reporters questions concerning the statement by the leader of the Greek Cypriot administration, Kiprianou, in [name indistinct]. Upon being recalled that Kiprianou had said that the Greek Cypriot side came to the negotiating table with good will and that the Turkish Cypriot reply [words indistinct] at the next round of talks, Denktas said that he (?had just learned) that Kiprianou was expecting a reply from the Turkish Cypriot side and added: As far as I know the negotiators have put everything on the table and they will continue the negotiations. If Kiprianou is expecting something from the Turkish Cypriot side he should clarify it. He should always bear in mind that the negotiations are being held within the framework of a package agreement. We are the ones who are waiting for the rapid lift of the inhuman embargo imposed on the Turkish Cypriot community. It is quite absurd that Kiprianou, who is continuing the embargo, can refer to good will?

In reply to a question on Kiprianou's statement to the effect that there should be a substantial change in the Turkish Cypriot attitude in order to achieve progress at the negotiations, Denktas said: Apparently he is waiting for a substantial change in the Turkish Cypriot attitude. If he maintains his current stand then he will be able to see a substantial change. However, he will not be pleased at all. If he wants a bizonal [last word in English] system within the framework of the principles I reached with Makarios and which he seemed to support then he should [word indistinct] the government and he should not close his eyes in the face of the realities. He is faced with a people authorized--as much as he is--to defend itself and its land and rights and with a state and a government established through the will of this people, a federation can be established by these two equal peoples and their determination to form a joint central administration.

In reply to Kiprianou's remarks that the Turkish Cypriot side has yet to agree on a system with which to investigate the missing persons issue, Denktas said: Kiprianou is deceiving his people on the missing persons issue. Since 1977, the Turkish Cypriot side has been exerting efforts to form an investigating committee. The Greek Cypriot side has been undermining these efforts through procedural obstacles due to political reasons. Denktas added that the Turkish Cypriot side agreed in 1977 to the formation of a committee composed of representatives to be appointed by the two sides and of a representative appointed by the International Red Cross and approved by the two sides. He noted that the committee could begin operating within the framework of the agreements reached in 1977 and 1979. Denktas said that the Greek Cypriot side was constantly obstructing the formation of this committee through [words indistinct] obstacles because such a committee would reveal that the Greek Cypriot side has been lying on the issue. He added that a missing persons committee will find out and announce to the world, which has been deceived by Greek Cypriot propaganda for so long, that some 800 Turkish Cypriot missing persons had been executed by the Greek Cypriot soldiers and police and buried in mass graves.

Denktas concluded by saying: We call on Kiprianou to be realistic and to tell the truth to his own people. It is meaningless and even detrimental for Kiprianou to adopt a provocative stand on this issue and to accuse the Turkish Cypriot side while officials are holding contacts with both sides on the issue. Kiprianou seems to have forgotten that the missing persons issue was officially taken up in meetings held between 1974 and 1975 and also attended by representatives of the International Red Cross and that the necessary investigation was conducted. It is a pity that he is hiding this reality from his own people and the rest of the world.

MESIMVRINI ON 'EXPANDED' GREEK-SOVIET COOPERATION

[Text] Our accession to the EEC will not affect Greek-Soviet relations in the sector of economic and technical cooperation. This was confirmed in practice yesterday with the signing of an agreement between Greece and the Soviet Union which provides:

Supply of two million tons of Soviet oil during 1981.
Progress in the agreement on alumina.
Increased orange and other citrus fruit exports to the Soviet Union.
Additional progress on the supply of five billion cubic [meters]--of Soviet natural gas from 1981 to 1986.
Increased supply of Soviet electric energy.

The Soviet side also expressed interest in the following:

Purchase of Greek light industry products (such as clothing).
Repair of Soviet commercial shipping in Greek shipbuilding units (in addition to the existing agreement on the Neorion [of Siros].)

The signing of the agreement took place at the Foreign Ministry at noon yesterday. Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis later gave a luncheon for the Soviet Foreign Trade Deputy Minister A. Manzhulo, who led the Soviet delegation. The new eight-year agreement--which is a sequel to the one signed in Moscow in 1979 during the visit of K. Karamanlis, who was prime minister at that time--aligns Greek-Soviet cooperation in the economic and technical sectors with conditions which prevail in parallel instances of Soviet cooperation with other EEC countries.

According to the released statement, the agreement provides for encouragement by both sides of the development of economic and industrial cooperation between Greek businesses, organizations and companies and parallel Soviet organizations in the sectors of industry, agriculture, trade and technology in such a way that exchanges will increase to the maximum. Toward this end the two parties will work toward as smooth and as balanced as possible development of their economic and industrial relations.

An intergovernment committee will be set up to supervise implementation of the agreement, meeting as a rule once a year, alternately in Greece and in the Soviet Union, on proposal from either one of the two parties.

During the meeting of the two delegations which was also attended by the Soviet ambassador in Athens there was a general review of economic and trade relations, with the following conclusions:

We will receive two million tons of oil from the Soviet Union during 1981 as provided for under the Moscow agreement (1979).
ETVA, the Hellenic Industrial Development Bank, will prepare a study on the expediency of construction in Greece of an alumina plant by the Soviet Union (utilization of bauxite deposits). The greatest part of the production of this plant will be absorbed by the Soviet Union.
Our exports of oranges and other citrus fruits as well as tobacco to the Soviet Union will be increased.
There will be discussion of details on the export to the Soviet Union of Greek light industry products--primary readymade clothing.
Details will be discussed for the signing of an official agreement on the repair of Soviet commercial shipping in Greek shipbuilding yards.

It was further established during the negotiations that:

There was progress on the question of the Soviet supply of natural gas. The Greek side said our country needs one billion cubic meters of Soviet natural gas per year over the 1981 to 1986 period and two billion per year for succeeding years.

There will be an increase in the supply of electric energy in 1981 which will be 25 percent higher than that supplied in 1980. This will be night energy, daylight and peak period energy and will reach Greece via the Bulgarian electric network.

I AVYI QUESTIONS GROUNDWORK FOR USSR COOPERATION

AT241515 Athens I AVYI in Greek 24 Dec 80 p 6

[From the 'I AVYI' column: "What Preparation Was There?"]

[Text] Without a doubt the Greek-Soviet agreement on economic cooperation is a positive step in the right direction, in other words of further development of Greek-Soviet relations under the conditions of our country's accession to the EEC. The facts which Deputy Foreign Minister Rendis announced, however, give rise to certain questions in relations to the degree in which the government has seriously dealt with the implementation of the conditions of this agreement.

For example, Rendis stated that our country will receive from the Soviet Union 1 billion cubic meters of natural gas during 1981 and that this quantity will be increased during the next 5 years. What groundwork has been undertaken, however, to make receipt of such quantities of natural gas possible from the Soviet Union? What organization was set up and what installations were built for this purpose? It is well known that in order to get Soviet natural gas to Greece it was planned to construct a pipeline of 60 kilometers approximately from the Greek-Bulgarian frontier to Xanthi. It is also well known that our country was to contribute toward the project of strengthening the pipelines leading up to the Greek-Bulgarian frontier from the central line which comes from the Soviet Union. What has been done about all this to date? We much fear that the government left all this necessary preparatory work in an embryo stage. This fact will seriously threaten implementation of the extremely useful agreements signed with the Soviet Union. We must also add that the government is now also negotiating with Algeria for our supply from that country of an additional supply of approximately 2.5 billion cubic meters of natural gas per year. What we mentioned above also applies for this quantity. Under what program does the government classify these negotiations and with what groundwork does it plan to implement a possible agreement? Could we be faced by the phenomenon that one government service does not know what the other is doing?

RIZOSPASTIS CLAIMS ARMY TAKING POLITICAL ACTION

[Excerpts] At midnight last Monday, an army platoon on "assigned duty" and under the command of an officer destroyed at Litokhoron of Pieria posters of the KNE [Communist Youth Organization] by painting them black. This unprecedented action, which took place only few days after Defense Minister Averof's inflammatory statement, has caused reaction from the people of the area. This event, it is pointed out, furnishes practical proof of a tendency for open involvement of the armed forces in the country's political life, at the instigation or incitement of at least some key members of the government.

Specifically, shortly after midnight a group of 20 soldiers, headed by an officer, came to the center of Litokhoron and, using black paint, began destroying KNE posters which were put up during the last few days and which carried slogans for reduced military service.

Moreover, at some point the commanding officer--his rank has not been established--ordered the soldiers to expand their activities beyond the destruction of the posters. Thus, they painted black the signboard outside the KKE office of Litokhoron.

KKE Deputy Comrade Mitsos Sakhiis contacted Minister for Northern Greece N. Martis and reported this unprecedented terrorist incident and pointed out the government's huge responsibilities. He stressed that this incident confirms the fears of the people and the KKE charges about the Army's involvement in the country's political developments.

RIZOSPASTIS SEES AGREEMENT ON CRUISE MISSILES

NC251640 Athens RIZOSPASTIS in Greek 25 Dec 80 p 12

[Text] The New Democracy government would willingly agree to the establishment of U.S. cruise and Pershing II missiles on Greek territory should this be required by NATO strategic needs!

This question was the subject of pertinent consultations in Brussels in which Greek representatives had participated without raising any objections to them. According to reports from the Belgian capital, it was agreed that Greece could "host" part of the U.S. "Euromissiles" should there be any difficulties of a technical or political nature in the course of implementing the U.S.-NATO program in member states (Belgium, Netherlands) or should there be fresh military needs that would make "necessary" the utilization" of Greek territory. But irrespective of the "formula" to be used, it is a fact that the NATO military leadership is oriented toward the establishment of U.S. missiles in Greece as well. The pertinent preparations are already under way.

According to the same reports, the question is connected with the presence of U.S. bases, which will most probably be the sites where the new missiles will be installed. One should not rule out the inclusion of such arrangements in the pertinent secret supplements that will accompany the basic text of the forthcoming Greek-U.S. agreement. Precisely for this reason, the NATO leadership insists that the question of the bases must be "closed" prior to the next parliamentary elections, during which it is very probable that the rightwing will lose. Such a prospect, which is viewed at NATO headquarters with great concern, would--it is believed--cause implications in the procedure for establishing U.S. missiles in Greece.

Such a likelihood appears to have been discussed by Averof and Mitsotakis in Brussels during the recent Atlantic sessions. It is said that the NATO representatives have openly taken up this question with the two ministers in order to investigate the possible developments in the country's internal front. Representatives of the nuclear planning team have sounded, for the same purpose, leaders of the opposition in order to secure their tacit approval, or even a favorable stand, toward the prospect of installing U.S. missiles.

In a statement before the meeting, Kocatopcu said that Turkey desired to engage in a wide cooperation with Iraq in the industrial field. He added that this economic cooperation could include other neighboring and Islamic countries as well. The visiting minister said that his country also desired the promotion of relations with Turkey in all fields. He stated that his country wanted to cooperate with Turkey especially in the field of glass and cement industries as well as irrigation projects, and wanted to employ Turkish experts. At-Tawfiq paid a courtesy visit to Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen at 1730. He had met earlier separately with Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu and State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal.

Meanwhile, the Turkish-Iraqi Joint Economic Committee continued its work today. A protocol is expected to be signed tomorrow after the committee meetings are concluded.

Protocol Signed on Pipeline

TA261524 Ankara Domestic Service in Turkish 1400 GMT 26 Dec 80

[Text] At the end of the first round of the Turkish-Iraqi Joint Economic Committee meetings which were held in Ankara it was decided to enlarge the capacity of the Kerkuk [Kirkuk]-Yumurtalik oil pipeline. Accordingly, the 35 million tons of crude oil pumped through the pipeline annually will be raised to 45-50 million tons.

A protocol signed at the end of the meetings notes that the two sides agree to the connection of the Ceyhan terminal with the Yumurtalik-Kirikkale pipeline that will carry oil to the Middle East-Anatolia refinery being built in Kirikkale. Turkey and Iraq will cooperate in the establishment of an export-oriented refinery and petrochemical installation in Yumurtalik. Under the protocol, the two sides will set up a joint technical committee that will study issues related to regional matters.

The protocol also states that Turkey will be able to participate in the tenders issued in Iraq on iron, steel, sugar, cement, bottle and textile factories. Turkish companies and contractors working in Iraq will have more privileges. The protocol also envisages the expansion and diversification of the economic, commercial and technical cooperation between the two countries.

The protocol was signed by State Minister and Deputy Prime Minister Turgut Ozal on behalf of Turkey and by Industry and Minerals Minister Tahir at-Tawfiq on behalf of Iraq. Speaking at the signing ceremony, Turgut Ozal said:

[Begin recording] The talks, which lasted 2 days, were conducted in an atmosphere of understanding. We view them as an important step in the future relations of the friendly and brotherly nations. We believe that Turkey must have good relations with Iraq and its neighbors for peace, tranquillity and stability in the region. We are convinced that our relations with the brotherly and friendly Iraqi nation, with whom we have lived together for centuries, will further improve. [end recording]

Also speaking at the ceremony the Iraqi Minister of Industry and Minerals said:

[Begin recording in Arabic fading into Turkish translation]

I would like to express my happiness that the first meeting of the Joint Economic Committee yielded such positive results. These positive results, which come from the good will of the two sides, constitute an important step in raising Turkish-Iraqi relations to the highest level. I am convinced that Turkish-Iraqi relations will develop in the interests of both countries. Let me point this out too: We are making efforts to further develop the closeness between our two peoples, which have a common history and religion. [end recording]

TURKMEN, DENKTAS HOLD NEWS CONFERENCE ON CYPRUS

[Text] Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen said that a confidence crisis lies at the root of the Cyprus problem. However, the continuation of the intercommunal talks for 3 months constitutes a significant development. Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas then said that the Cyprus problem could be solved with good will, patience and care.

Denktas, who is currently in Ankara for a joint assessment of the intercommunal talks with the Turkish Government, held a joint news conference with Turkmen this morning after concluding his contacts on the subject. In an opening statement at the news conference, Turkmen noted that the talks with Denktas in Ankara were extremely useful and constructive. Pointing out that the assessment showed once more than the Turkish Cypriot side is pursuing its meaningful and constructive attitude for the settlement of the problem, Turkmen said: There is a confidence crisis at the root of the Cyprus problem. Hence, the fact that the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities succeeded, after many years, in remaining at the negotiating table for over 3 months and exchanged views concerning the solution of the problems in itself constitutes a significant development. Within this framework, the fact that the Cyprus issue was not debated at the UN General Assembly for the first time since 1974 and a resolution on the Cyprus issue was not adopted is an encouraging factor in the two communities' efforts to seek a solution.

Noting that it was decided that the Turkish Cypriot side would continue its constructive stance during the talks, Turkmen said that a settlement of the Cyprus problem should ensure that the pre-1974 conditions are not repeated. Turkmen said that he and Denktas noted that it is possible to discuss constructively the temporary measures that will inspire confidence between the two communities and assist in a final settlement. Turkmen added that it was stressed during his talks with Denktas that it is necessary to take measures to inspire the trust of the Turkish Cypriot community in the Greek Cypriot community in a bid to attain a comprehensive solution to the Cyprus problem.

In his speech, Denktas said that his talks in Ankara were constructive and beneficial. He then replied to journalists' questions. In reply to a question, Denktas said that the Turkish Cypriot side has proposed to the Greek Cypriot side a series of temporary practical measures for the solution of the Cyprus problem, that the Greek Cypriots are considering them, and that a final answer has not yet been received.

Noting that the negotiations on the territorial aspect are continuing, Denktas said that the stage of territorial give-and-take has not yet been reached and that he considers it harmful to conclude the subject at this stage.

Pointing out that the Turkish Cypriot side is prepared to do what is necessary if the opening of Maras [Varosha] to temporary settlement will contribute to the solution of the problem, Denktas said that, however, the Turkish Cypriot side took the necessary measures to prevent the Greek Cypriots from adopting an evasive attitude after securing this.

A journalist asked Denktas whether or not the Cyprus problem would be solved in the near future. Denktas replied that there were still many more things to negotiate. Hoever, this does not mean that the talks cannot suddenly be accelerated and a speedy solution reached.

In reply to another question, Denktas noted that the fact that the Greek Cypriot side has been sitting at the negotiating table for 3 months could be interpreted as a change of attitude.

Denktas Leaves After Talks

[Text] Turkish Federated State of Cyprus President Rauf Denktas left Turkey for Cyprus today after completing his talks in Ankara. President Denktas was seen off at Ankara's Esenboga Airport by Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu and Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen. In a statement at the airport, Denktas said that he visited Ankara in order to exchange views with Turkish Government officials on the issue of the intercommunal talks being held in Cyprus. He added that an agreement was reached on this subject as expected. Denktas continued: The Cyprus problem--our national issue--has reached the present stage with the support and understanding of motherland and guarantor Turkey. The final stage we are longing for is the return of final peace to Cyprus. As the Turkish Cypriot side, we have always proved our good will and determination to this effect. Pointing out that he hoped that in the coming stage of the intercommunal talks the other side would also sit at the negotiating table with similar good will, Denktas said he believed that peace could be secured in Cyprus in a short while. Derktas was accompanied by Turkish Cypriot Foreign Affairs, Defense and Tourism Minister Kenan Atakol.

EC COMMISSION PRESIDENT THORN DISCUSSES EEC FUTURE

DW291226 Hamburg DER SPIEGEL in German 29 Dec 80 pp 24-29

[Interview with Gaston Thorn, president of the European Community Commission, by reporters Wolfgang Kaden and Hans Gerhard Stephani in London; date not given]

[Text] SPIEGEL: Mr Thorn, what prompts a renowned politician to become appointed president of the European Community Commission?

Thorn: First, I have been a member of the Luxembourg Government for 12 years, and naturally I want to do something different now. Second, Europe has been a great challenge to me since my childhood.

SPIEGEL: The post of Commission president, shaped by Walter Hallstein in the fifties and sixties, was quite attractive for some time. Today it seems, however, that it has been reserved for politicians who are no longer so successful in their home countries.

Thorn: I cannot prevent you from judging me in such a way. Just one comment on that: A politician who is about to make a career at home, particularly in a big country, will not take on this difficult post. He would not have just one boss like at home, namely, his government chief, but 9 or 10 of them. I believe that most politicians want to be successful at home first. I would say that I have passed through that already.

SPIEGEL: Do you seriously believe you can achieve something politically by heading the Commission? At the beginning of the eighties the European Community sometimes gives the impression of being a fossil from postwar times.

Thorn: The European Community is not a fossil. Agreed, we no longer live in the golden years of the Community of the fifties or sixties. But one does not take over a job only if everything is working smoothly. Almost everybody could do that. It is going downhill at the moment because the economy is going downhill and because we have greater political problems, because we are about to extend the Community without any parallel consolidation or intensification. This is the moment we must try to change the course.

SPIEGEL: Do you really think you can do that?

Thorn: I will try with all my strength to do it. I think it can be done because it must be done. There is no acceptable alternative to the Community. That is true with regard to the eighties as it was true with regard to the fifties, although it is true today for other reasons than at that time. At present the member states consider themselves again as competitors in the Community.

SPIEGEL: There was always competition, even in the first years of the European Community.

Thorn: At that time it was not the same as it is today. In the fifties we had a vacuum after two world wars, after the world crisis of the thirties, after the opening of the world markets. Until 1973, for example, one could sell as much steel as one wanted to, regardless of prices. Today the market is becoming narrower, everybody underbids everybody. Earlier there were undercapacities in Europe, now there are overcapacities; the sellers market has turned into a buyers market.

SPIEGEL: Is it true that no political perspective exists for Europe today--a perspective the founding fathers of Europe such as Schumann, Adenauer or Monet had in the fifties?

Thorn: I would not absolutely contradict that. But I would like to point out the European Treaty of Rome. It was something like a time schedule, with the first part being worked out precisely and in detail, with the rest to develop later on automatically.

SPIEGEL: That was an illusion.

Thorn: Yes. First we worked according to the schedule. Later on it became more difficult because it was not put down precisely in the treaty.

SPIEGEL: The old reserve of things one had in common has been exhausted and nothing new seems in the offing. What remains for the future in the way of political integration?

Thorn: The first part of your statement seems correct to me. But I would not say that we have nothing in common any more. Be it the energy problem, the East-West conflict, the dispute between industrial states and developing states--we are all in the same boat.

SPIEGEL: There does not seem to be much indication of that. Fighting for position and quarrels obviously prevail.

Thorn: Our economic success has created difficulties for us. The following question seems important today: Hasn't the gap between the top countries and the other countries become too great? One is hypnotized too much by the relative position of the other state. This is all we see at the moment, instead of finding out about the new things we have in common.

SPIEGEL: Such petty fighting for position seems inevitable if there are no longer any higher political aims. Does the new president of the Commission see a change to give the Europe of Brussels a new impetus?

Thorn: I want to point out something to you in this connection: When the Community was founded the then promising economic branches of coal and steel were combined in the coal and steel pool. Something similar was tried later on when nuclear research was concentrated in Euratom. At that time we put together the branches that seemed most developed in order to project our Community into the future. What do the member states do today? Today they yell for help when it is too late. The Community would face hard times if it were only a hospital for the ailing sectors and not a laboratory for the branches with a future.

SPIEGEL: The European Community is well trained in taking care of the ailing. For almost 20 years it has spent enormous amounts to finance Europe's farmers. It seems that the common agricultural market can no longer be financed. That will probably be the main issue you will have to deal with in the near future, will it not?

Thorn: That is certainly correct. But may I say that I sometimes become more than nervous when I hear all the things that are being said about agriculture policy.

SPIEGEL: ...We will say some more things about this.

Thorn: What is being said about the agricultural market is not wrong. But one must also discuss the joint responsibility. Everybody in the Community knows that agricultural decisions are made unanimously, so nobody should ask me who the people were who did it.

SPIEGEL: All were involved?

Thorn: All, unanimously.

SPIEGEL: Including Thorn?

Thorn: Including Thorn, naturally, as far as he was involved.

SPIEGEL: And including Helmut Schmidt?

Thorn: And including the Federal Republic.

SPIEGEL: Looking for the guilty does not help much now. It would be an enormous step forward if it were agreed that matters cannot go on like this.

Thorn: I find the Common Agricultural Policy not as bad as it is frequently described. Naturally it costs money. But gentlemen, do you know how much the American agricultural policy costs the Americans? Do you know how much the Japanese agricultural policy costs the Japanese? Much more per capita. Do you know how much the national governments pay in addition to the money we pay from the cashbox of the Community for the agricultural policy?

SPIEGEL: That does not improve the matter. The worst thing about the European agricultural misery is not even the current spending of billions. The rates of increase are even more objectionable; in past years there has been an annual average rate of increase of 20 percent in expenditures for farmers.

Thorn: You are certainly right there. But how did these cost increases come about? When the agricultural market was set up in the fifties, the countries involved were in a position to produce 80 to 85 percent of what they needed. Today it is more than 100 percent.

SPIEGEL: ...Because excessive price guarantees invite the peasants to produce more than is needed.

Thorn: When things were being set up we indeed did not properly see the danger of overproduction. Now we face the problem that the agricultural market eats up all the money of the Community.

SPIEGEL: Some 75 percent of the European Community's money is consumed by agriculture.

Thorn: That is something we have to bring under control. Particularly now since all member states are in a much more difficult financial situation. Otherwise we will not be able to prompt the Council of Ministers to map out new policies if the little money that can be set free will be fully consumed by agricultural policy.

SPIEGEL: The agricultural market of the European Community functions at present according to the rule that those who produce more, will get more money because of the prices guaranteed by Brussels. Prices no longer offset supply and demand because surplus products are being bought at set prices by the authorities. Do you deem it possible that the European Community states could discard this state control which has nothing at all to do with market economy?

Thorn: I do not believe we will fully abandon it. It is a sacred principle of the Community, so to speak, to guarantee an income to the farmers in line with general developments. But, and this is where we agree, it should not lead to subsidized overproduction.

SPIEGEL: How do you plan to stop it?

Thorn: We must make the farmers share the responsibility. Concretely, those who put out a quantity beyond a certain limit cannot expect to sell their products at European Community prices, which are higher than world market prices. We must tell the individual farmers: If you produce more, the surplus production will not be bought at the high prices.

SPIEGEL: A marvelous solution. In addition to the already existing enormous bureaucracy there will be a new one to say how much milk a peasant can milk from his cows and how much grain he can plant in his fields.

Thorn: We already have the bureaucracy. If we reward it properly it will handle the additional job.

SPIEGEL: This seems to be a step which makes the system even more absurd.

Thorn: No, I don't think so.

SPIEGEL: Suppose you tell a farmer that he is allowed to produce a mere 3,000 liters of milk a year. You will punish him if he produces 4,000 liters, that is, if he is more diligent.

Thorn: This need not necessarily be the case. It is conceivable, after all, that there could be a graduated price system under which only those are hit who want to get rich through an abnormally high output.

SPIEGEL: The question is whether a system which already constitutes an absurdity can be saved by being rendered even more absurd. Would it not be more appropriate to abolish the whole darned agricultural system?

Thorn: And what should come then?

SPIEGEL: You can guarantee income in various ways. You do not need guaranteed prices for that purpose under all circumstances. Direct state income subsidies are also conceivable.

Thorn: By that you would turn farmers into state officials.

SPIEGEL: This is what they already are, de facto, today.

Thorn: That would lead to a degree of socialization that seems to be dangerous to me, and to a state control that would be even more dangerous.

SPIEGEL: After all, hardly any more state control is possible than what we have now. Besides, prior to their EC accession the British had such a system direct of income subsidies.

Thorn: The situation in Great Brit in was different because the island state depended on the outside world for its food supply. In the EC we are largely self-sufficient, and wish to remain so. It is up to us to determine whether all of Europe with 10 or 12 countries will be dependent tomorrow on supplies from New Zealand or South America.

SPIEGEL: But this is not the inevitable consequence. After all, agriculture need not be abolished right away.

Thorn: This may be the consequence. We depend on the outside world with regard to energy, and it would be highly objectionable if this were also the case with respect to foodstuffs.

SPIEGEL: We do not think that the farmers should receive an adequate state pension which is entirely independent of how much they produce. Mixed systems consisting of income subsidies, particularly for the poorest farmers, and price guarantees are conceivable.

Thorn: This would be worth considering.

SPIEGEL: The situation to date, Mr Thorn, is such, however, that any reform of this agricultural system has been blocked, mostly by France. Could it be that the available funds will no longer be sufficient in 1981, or not later than in 1982? Then the compulsion for a reform will be so strong that the governments really will have to do something.

Thorn: This compulsion exists even now. Please do not misunderstand me. But I accuse people in highranking positions criticizing agricultural policy of failure to offer any alternative. It is perhaps necessary to exempt the British from this charge; but their alternative political system was not acceptable to the Community.

SPIEGEL: The provision that decisions can only be made with the approval of all governments, that is to say that there is no such thing as majority decisions of the Council of Ministers, continues to be a decisive reason for the inability to make reforms. The bigger the Community grows the more problematic the compulsion for unanimity seems to be. As soon as the Community is enlarged again the point will be reached where nothing will work anymore because they will be blocking each other all around.

Thorn: The danger does exist. If we retain unanimity, things will be even more difficult in an enlarged Community. The common denominator will be smaller.

SPIEGEL: Do you personally believe that the governments on principle should repudiate unanimity?

Thorn: I will advocate that. But on the other hand, I do not want to see a religious war start over this topic tomorrow.

SPIEGEL: Who needs to be more afraid of unanimity anyway, the smaller states or the big states?

Thorn: Majority decisions would be dangerous to smaller countries. Let us take a drastic example: If the matter at issue is to outvote Luxembourg, the others would think only once. At best, they would perhaps think twice before outvoting Holland, but to outvote Germany, England or France they would think six times.

SPIEGEL: Mr Thorn, are the new EC members--Greece now effective 1 January, and Spain and Portugal later--not heading for quite inevitably grave disappointments? They will be joining the Community in the hope of help in solving their financial and economic problems. But the Brussels coffers are empty.

Thorn: Their disappointments will be relatively proportionate to their excessively great expectations. I do not wish to be cynical, but that is how matters stand. This is what I have often told my friends in Greece, in Spain and in other countries. But even this would not have prevented them from filing their membership applications. The trend, after all, is increasingly to be a member of a larger grouping.

SPIEGEL: The original Europe of six was made up of somewhat equally developed states. The people governing these countries also had similar convictions about the EC's future. With the accession of England, Ireland and Denmark 8 years ago these views drifted apart. Following the accession of the three new members practically nothing will be left of the lofty goals of an economically as well as politically united Europe. Can Europe survive without a concept of a political goal?

Thorn: Since the founding years we have not had the courage to discuss the objectives realistically. Under the shock of the crisis of 1965 when De Gaulle nearly let the Community fall apart, and also under the shock of the whole British problem, they never mustered the courage again to sit down at a table and say: Say, Mr Britisher, say, Mr Federal Republic representative, say, Mr Frenchman, what kind of Europe would you like to have by the year 2000?

SPIEGEL: You mean to say that the question of expansion in effect has never been discussed politically?

Thorn: It would have been necessary to discuss not only the expansion of the Community, but also the Community itself, its deepening and its objectives.

SPIEGEL: These, after all, are interrelated.

Thorn: Both should have been subjects of discussion. Our Community, even the original Community of the Six, would have needed a discussion on Europe's future after the first serious crisis of 1965. We should have made up our minds on what kind of Europe we wanted for the end of the second millennium. Instead more and more new and sophisticated reports and recommendations were written which by now would fill up a sizeable library. Today we must ask ourselves, without bashing each other's head in: Where do we propose to go from here? To this day we have not discussed this question in detail.

SPIEGEL: Will the new president of the Commission, Thorn, pose this crucial question on the heads of government? Obviously you did not ask them that way when you were prime minister and foreign minister.

Thorn: I did ask.

SPIEGEL: And what was the answer you received?

Thorn: None, reports were ordered. But I do believe that the heads of state and government are prepared to discuss final results in view of the agricultural problem, the lack of funds and the expansion.

SPIEGEL: Is the EC not heading straight for becoming a mere free trade zone? It is hard for us to imagine how common policy will be possible in the near future with 12 countries involved.

Thorn: I would be supporting your stance were I to add that I know good and well-known Europeans who told me the other day that if the economic problems keep growing more aggravated as they have in the past few months, then it would be a good thing if just the Common Market were to remain. All of us complain about the Japanese. But if we see how differently the individual European countries react to the Japanese challenge, we cannot but admit that this market, praised as being a common one is really in danger.

SPIEGEL: How much time do you give yourself in your new job for solving at least the most urgent problems?

Thorn: This Commission must manage to achieve this within the first 18 months, otherwise it would be a flop.

SPIEGEL: Mr Thorn, thank you for this interview.

SPOKESMAN ON EC 'WORKING PLAN' FOR MIDEAST

LD291812 Hamburg DPA in German 1427 GMT 29 Dec 80

[Text] Bonn, 29 Dec (DPA)--Bonn Government Spokesman Kurt Becker today again denied the existence of a European Community peace plan for the Middle East. Asked about the correctness of the recent report in the Belgium newspaper LE SOIR, Becker told journalists that the alleged plan is in fact a working paper with a "limitless number of options." The Federal Government is not committed by the existence of this paper, which was drawn up by a group of EC experts, including Bonn diplomats.

Becker said that the Community will not present any plans of its own before the new U.S. president, Ronald Reagan, and his administration have formulated their stance on the Middle East problem.

Becker also said that in Bonn's view the important points of a Middle East peace settlement include the ending of the occupation of Arab territory, the right to self-determination for the Palestinians, securities and guarantees--including Israel's right to exist--and regulation of Jerusalem's status.

FDP SPOKESMAN COMMENTS ON MIDEAST 'DEADLOCK'

LD281701 Hamburg DPA in German 1439 GMT 28 Dec 80

[Text] [no dateline given] FDP foreign policy spokesman Juergen Moellemann told DPA in Bonn that it would be useful if the EC were to replace on how to turn the Venice and Luxembourg statements of principle into practice and how the total deadlock or even a warlike development in the Middle East could be avoided. There was indeed as little chance of getting by without an Israeli withdrawal from the occupied territories as there was of getting by without the creation of a Palestinian state, possibly in confederation with Jordan.

Beyond that, guarantees of existence, especially for Israel, would have to be given in Moellemann's opinion. He expressed the expectation that the new American Government would soon be inviting all parties concerned for a comprehensive peace conference. In order to bring that about further EC initiatives could be useful, above all in relation to the attitude of certain Arab states.

CHEVENEMENT VIEWS PS-PCF RELATIONS, ELECTIONS

LD291217 Paris LE MONDE in French 23 Dec 80 p 10

[Excerpt] On the evening of Friday, 19 December, Jean-Pierre Chevenement, member of the PS National Secretariat, said at the microphone in the Europe 1 Press Club that Francois Mitterrand "has the biggest chance he has ever had of being elected" president of the republic. "I have every confidence that he will uphold the Socialist plan," the leader of the Center for Socialist Studies Research and Education (CERES) added.

In reply to questions about the attitude of a Socialist president toward the PCF, Chevenement considered it would be "normal" for Communist ministers to be in the government "if the PCF accepts obligations of governmental solidarity." The deputy for Belfort agreed that the PCF "is not at present following the path" of agreement. Such an agreement could not come about, according to Chevenement, between the two presidential ballots, if there were no such agreement before the first ballot.

"Our aim is not to subjugate the PCF but to associate it with us," he specified; "all we want to do is to give the PCF its due place."

After denying the existence of a "pact" between the PS and the RPR, Chevenement asserted that the Socialists intend to "assemble the biggest possible spread of people without any exclusion."

Questioned as to whether he would like to see Michel Debre enter a Socialist government, the CERES leader replied: "It is not I who will have to form a government; it is Francois Mitterrand who will do so. If Michel Debre, in the name of public salvation, deems it necessary to carry out reforms of very important structures in France, it is obvious ... that a government of a union of the left may extend to all those who, though formerly described as men of the right, nevertheless have at heart the general interest and national independence and want profound changes in France and to shake up politics in France in order to give a future back to our people and enable the workers not only to breathe but also to hope."

Referring to the "Socialist plan," he specified: "It is a rallying plan for many French people, not only for all people of the left but also for many sincere democrats, for many patriots." ...."I am convinced that there will be a jolt next May and that the PCF will not be able to prevent it as it did in 1978."

After describing governmental policy as "disastrous" and summarizing it in a concise formula: "Democratic anaethesia, creeping fascism, the end of France," Chevenement reaffirmed his conviction that Mitterrand, once elected, would be able to "create the conditions for a powerful new majority which will enable the necessary changes to be implemented in order to extricate the country from the crisis."

BALSEMAO TO ANNOUNCE NEW GOVERNMENT 31 DEC

LD292254 Lisbon in Portuguese to Europe 1900 GMT 29 Dec 80

[Excerpts] It appears that the government of Pinto Balsemao has not yet been completely formed. Some portfolio allocations are said to be giving rise to controversy, such as industry and technology, and for reasons of solidarity, internal administration and foreign affairs.

As a matter of fact, judging by what the evening newspaper A TARDE reported tonight quoting reliable Democratic Alliance sources, the composition of the seventh constitutional government could undergo major changes in a day or so.

The controversy is said to be around the industry portfolio, which the Social Democratic Center Party appears to claim for a person of its political persuasion, (?Basilio) Horta, in which event Alvaro Barreto, the present holder of the portfolio, would have to go. According to the source quoted by the newspaper, the minister of internal administration, Eurico de Melo, is said to be reacting adversely to this bid to replace Alvaro Barreto, having proposed to Prime Minister-designate Pinto Balsemao that he would agree to serve in the new government provided that Alvaro Barreto is retained as industry minister.

Pinto Balsemao and Eurico de Melo were meeting today to resolve the matter. If an agreement is not reached, Eurico de Melo will not remain in the government nor will the new foreign minister, Andre Goncalves Pereira, agree to join the new government.

In any event, the composition of the new government will not be officially announced by the prime minister-designate until Wednesday at a news conference, after three successive meetings of the Democratic Allaince leaders.

AVANTE! HITS NATION INTERFERENCE IN POLISH AFFAIRS

LD241519 Lisbon AVANTE! in Portuguese 18 Dec 80 p 11

[Unattributed article: "What Interference?"]

[Text] The foreign ministers of the 15 NATO countries have just decided in Brussels on a series of possible sanctions to be adopted in the event of a Soviet military intervention in Poland, no more, no less. A few days previously a Warsaw Pact meeting expressed its confidence that "the Polish people will manage to surmount the present problems, thus guaranteeing the country's development as a 'firm link in the shared family of communism,'" as Kania said. At the same time the socialist community, particularly the Soviet Union and the GDR, is committing itself to helping Poland by means of unconditional loans to surmount the country's difficult economic situation, still being aggravated by strikes.

What is the reason for this more than evident commitment from the NATO countries to a deterioration of the situation in Poland? In fact this commitment reflects real interference by imperialism in this country. Certain factors reveal to us the scale of this undeniable interference: it was stated explicitly at the Atlantic Treaty Association meeting (of NATO countries) in Madeira that it is desirable to duly exploit Polish nationalism to challenge the socialist community's essential unity. The November Atlantic conference in the Algarve proclaimed "a greater rapprochement with Poland," regarded as "a crucial point" for the socialist community. Is this "rapprochement" represented by the daily 60 hours of broadcasts by provocative radio stations to Poland in Polish? Or by the downright provocative campaign conducted by bourgeois information organs which pounds us day after day with the false image of a Poland in chaos? Why is so much being said about a Soviet military intervention when Brzezinski himself, Carter's adviser, said at the beginning of December that this hypothetical intervention was "neither inevitable nor imminent"? Is it not an inadmissible form of interference to acknowledge--even merely to acknowledge--the possibility of sanctions against Poland if the Polish Armed Forces are obliged to intervene against antisocial elements? Did anyone acknowledge the possibility of the severance of economic relations between the Soviet Union and France, for example, when the French Government used its navy against the fishermen who were conducting a just strike in defense of their interests?

In fact, quite apart from the problems which the building of socialism in Poland is encountering, what is happening at the moment is very serious interference by international capitalism in the internal life of the Polish people and an equal serious instance of taking advantage of the situation to foment anti-Sovietism and "justify" the arms race.

Interference

The Polish press recently denounced the slanderous campaign fomented by capitalist news media, rightly stressing that "Western interpretations of the crisis are influenced more by their hopes and dreams about the future development of the situation than by Polish reality." Capitalist hopes are also pinned on quite concrete contributions in this area: subversive broadcasts; the acquisition of funds to support forces, albeit dwindling forces, hostile to socialism, specifically in the guise of assistance to the new trade union; and even conspiratorial meetings, like the one recently condemned by PRAVDA referring to a meeting between Brzezinski and Polish scientists, masquerading as part of a scientific exchange program, a meeting about which specific facts are known and during which Brzezinski said that the current situation in Poland should be used to destabilize the country. It is now clear, as has been indicated not only by the Polish United Workers Party [PZPR] and other parties in power in Poland, but also by the Polish church, that there definitely are people bent on destabilization.

To "Justify" the Arms Race

There has never been a shortage of arguments to "justify" the arms race. There is the permanent "Soviet military threat" which is periodically brandished. Then along came the cases like Afghanistan--which is vainly proposing a political solution and which has always made the presence of Soviet troops on its territory conditional on the cessation of imperialist support for provocative groups. Now it is Poland, or rather a possible military intervention in Poland which only NATO is talking about. The purpose of these fabricated arguments is not only to fuel the arms race but also to cast doubt on all initiatives capable of drawing peoples together or contributing to political and military detente. Thus there was an attempt to boycott the Olympic games; there was an attempt, and it is being talked about again, to jeopardize the Madrid conference and there is an attempt to repudiate SALT II. The last NATO meeting decided not only on possible sanctions in the event of the hypothetical situation which NATO wants to come about in Poland but also on the intensification of espionage against the socialist countries in the Warsaw Pact, bringing into play AWACS aircraft on the European continent, operating in the vicinity of borders with the socialist countries. At the same time, the European countries are under even greater pressure to increase their military expenditure and this contributes to a systematic exacerbation of the arms race.

The magazine FOREIGN POLICY, published in Washington by the Brookings Institution, proclaimed recently that the Soviet nuclear arsenal has been dwindling over the past 10 years. Leonid Brezhnev's proposal, put forward during his Indian visit, on the demilitarization of the Gulf, has so far been rejected by Washington on the pretext of the Afghan issue. The Soviet proposals, both in the sphere of talks on arms limitation and in the sphere of freezing military facts, are still unanswered. While in Madrid the delegations from the capitalist world are maintaining their effort to sabotage the work of this peace conference.

The truth is true and transparent. Imperialism's plan is to bank on the arms race, on brinkmanship and, if possible, on fomenting disunity among progressive forces, particularly among the socialist community countries.

LIBYAN OFFICIAL ANNOUNCES INCREASED OIL SALES

LD262240 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 2100 GMT 26 Dec 80

[Text] Ahmad ash-Shahati, secretary of the foreign communications office of Libya, the equivalent in Spain of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, said at a press conference today in Madrid that his country will sell Spain more oil. Ash-Shahati is in Spain on a private visit as part of a tour he is making to several European capitals. He justified the increase in sales of crude from his country to Spain on the grounds that Spain needs it and is a friend of Libya. The Libyan secretary of foreign communications said that a mixed commission comprised of representatives of the two countries will meet in January to decide upon the amount of the increase in oil sales. He also said that the dates for the visit to Spain by the head of state of his country, Mu'ammar al-Qadhdhafi, had not yet been fixed and that he had met today with Minister of Foreign Affairs Perez Llorca, the mayor of Madrid, Prof Tierno Galvan; the leader of the PCE, Santiago Carrillo; and the head of the Andalusian Socialist Party, Rojas Marcos.

LD270150 Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1900 GMT 26 Dec 80

[Summary] A new political party has been officiallv presented to the Andalusian media: Andalusian Unity [Unidao Andaluza]. The inspiration and main moving force behind the party is a professor at Seville University, Manuel Clavero Arevalo, a former minister and at the moment a member of parliament belonging to the Mixed Group. Andalusian Unity describes itself as a party supporting Andalusia for Andalusia, which it considers an essential, integral part of Spain; autonomy, but not separatism; democratic, nonmarxist humanism; the defense of freedom in politics, education, culture, the economy and in social matters; and progressive, innovative policies cutting across class lines without any link or dependence on any other political party or financial group.

BRIEFS

OIL FROM ALGERIA--Spain will import 1.65 million tons of Algerian oil during 1981, which is more than double the figure for the year just ending. In addition to the contract between CEPSA [Spanish Petroleum Company] and the Algerian national company Sonatrach [National Company for the Transport and Marketing of Hydrocarbons] for 750,000 tons per annum, there is now the contract signed on 23 December between Hispanoil [Spanish Oil Company] and the Algerian company for 900,000 tons per annum over the next 4 years. The most noteworthy point of the contract between Hispanoil and Sonatrach is an agreement for oil exploration which was signed by the two companies on 23 December. WHEAT TO USSR--The first shipment of wheat for the Soviet Union, which consists of 4,000 tons, has been loaded at the port of Santa Maria, in Cadiz Province. The total amount of wheat which Spain will export to the Soviet Union is just over 356,000 tons. [Text] [Madrid Domestic Service in Spanish 1800 GMT 25 Dec 80 LD]

MILLIYET INTERVIEWS WITH RALLIS, MITSOTAKIS

Rallis Interview

NC300842 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 27 Dec 80 p 1, 3

[Greek Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis interview with MILLIYET correspondent Nilufer Yalcin; date not given]

[Text] In an exclusive statement to MILLIYET correspondent Nilufer Yalcin, Greek Prime Minister Yeoryios Rallis said that he did not "preclude the possibility of a meeting between the Turkish and Greek prime ministers and that he would be pleased to meet the Turkish prime minister provided that certain concrete developments would result from the dialogue being conducted by the foreign ministers and Foreign Ministry secretaries-general."

Rallis added: "However, for such a meeting at the prime minister's level to yield concrete results, careful preparations have to be made. For the people of both countries expect many things, great results, from a meeting of this kind. If their expectations do not materialize, their disillusionment could be just as serious. We must therefore watch the development of the negotiations and hold our meeting at the prime minister's level when they reach their most productive stage."

Greek Prime Minister Rallis, who received us at his office in the parliament, described as "the work of a handful of fanatics" certain acts and statements regarding "greater Greece" which have been arousing suspicion in the mind of the Turkish nation. Rallis added: "These organizations, which still continue to talk about the grand idea (Megali idea) are composed of only a few groups which make themselves ludicrous. Their preachings have nothing to do with the true belief and tendencies of our people. That is why they become ludicrous. A vast majority of the Greek people resolutely believe that these two neighborly nations in this part of the world have to coexist and cooperate with each other."

Rallis then commented on the possibility of countering the anti-Turkey propaganda campaign being waged in the Greek press and in the publications of some associations belonging to certain ethnic groups in Greece: "We have, for a long time, been suggesting to such groups and to the Greek press to stop such publications; Karamanlis did this when he was prime minister, and I am doing the same thing now. I am planning to begin consultations with the press representatives after the new year. However, you must not forget that, as in every democratic country, in Greece, too, the press is completely free. It is impossible to bring pressure to bear on it; we can only advance suggestions. As to the associations, we cannot, by any means, legally interfere. Whoever wishes to set up an association can do so by gathering a few people around him and by submitting a petition to the court. We cannot interfere with their indoor meetings either. If they hold an open meeting and violate the law, only then can the security forces intervene. There again, the security forces can only try to influence them through suggestions and advice. Naturally, these suggestions do not always produce a change in the intentions of these groups. If they are not inspired by good intentions, they choose to go on their own way. We cannot take away the rights they enjoy under the Greek Constitution. This is our position and, unfortunately, we find it difficult to explain this situation to the Turkish authorities as well as to the Turkish press."

Responding to our remarks that the arming of the Greek islands and the establishment of confidence between the two countries are interlinked questions, Rallis said that "the discussion of these matters in great detail by the public at this stage could be detrimental" and added that "such discussions undermine the efforts we are exerting and the atmosphere of goodwill we are trying to create. This does not make our efforts easier. That is why I don't deem it useful to dwell on these matters at this stage."

Stating that "the Aegean continental shelf is the most difficult issue now being discussed between the two countries," Prime Minister Rallis continued: "I believe that the Aegean continental shelf is the most important and the most critical issue. Other issues are of minor importance. We are currently discussing the continental shelf issue. We are trying to find a formula which will not lead to new frictions in the future. I say it is difficult but I don't mean that no solution can be found. I believe a solution can be found, but I still say it is a critical issue."

Stating that "though it is complicated, the Aegean airspace dispute is not as critical as the continental shelf issue," Rallis went on to say that "he believed that the negotiations which are being carried out at foreign minister's and at secretaries-general' levels are progressing in a safe way."

Prime Minister Rallis continued: "It is not so easy to eradicate the atmosphere of distrust which has been accumlating over the years. But I believe that through good will on both sides, we will eventually be able to resolve our problems. Such an accomplishment will depend largely on the great and important role of the press in both countries. Newspapers should refrain from carrying inaccurate and unverified information. They should also refrain from adding fuel to the flames.

"I firmly believe that Mustafa Kemal and Veninezelos had concluded the Turkish-Greek Friendship Pact not so much because they had sentimental ties between them but because they were certain that their two neighorly countries could forge ahead for a surer and brighter future. This pact was realized in 1922, a short time after the great war. I also believe that the interests of both sides are as valid today as they were 50 years ago.

"If we wish to have a still better future we cannot afford to remain indifferent to the deterioration of our relations. We must explore ways and means of resolving our issues. I wish to express my firm optimism that at the end of our current dialogue our problems will be resolved."

At the end of our interview, Greek Prime Minister Rallis confirmed once again that Greece does not contemplate in any way impeding Turkey's activities in the EEC, including its efforts to obtain full membership.

Mitsotakis Interview

NC301144 Istanbul MILLIYET in Turkish 29 Dec 80 p 6

[Greek Foreign Minister Mitsotakis interview with MILLIYET correspondent Nilufer Yalcin; date, place not given]

[Excerpts] In his exclusive statement to MILLIYET, Greek Foreign Minister K. Mitsotakis said: "It will be in the interests of both Turkey and Greece to push aside matters that have created friction between them in the past and pursue a policy serving the future interests of both countries." He added: "The efforts exerted by the governments of both countries in this respect will be successful; they have to be successful. I believe that both the situation and the time are ripe for achieving success."

Asked: "What is your view with regard to rumors that the present administration in Turkey will pursue a milder policy and will be prepared to make certain concessions for resolving outstanding matters?" The Greek foreign minister gave the following reply: "We say categorically that we don't think about the present Turkish administration in such terms. At present, however, there are more favorable conditions to help settle matters. At present, terrorism [in Turkey] has been, to a great extent, brought under control and the administration has found the opportunity to consider certain solutions to critical matters. Naturally this creates a greater opportunity for Turkey in terms of its foreign policy. This is what is hoped for."

Noting that a number of matters related to the Aegean airspace issue were settled by Greece's reintegration into NATO, Mitsotakis stressed that the remaining issues "were being seriously taken up by the Athens Government, which wanted to resolve them as quickly as possible." He added: "It is difficult to say now whether or not we shall be able to settle all the matters. However, even if we resolve matters related to the Aegean airspace issue by stages, it will be useful. At present I do not want to go into detail on the matter. You must give me time; I may turn up with a statement on the matter in January."

Answering our questions, Mitsotakis expressed his belief that "property owned by the Turkish religious trust in western Thrace would not become a cause of friction between the two countries" and added: "The two sides agree to act within the framework of the Lausanne Treaty and on the basis of reciprocity. " He also stressed that Greece would not like to see this matter create new problems.

Noting that both "Greece and Turkey, which are not direct parties to the Cyprus question, could contribute toward reconciliation between the two [Cypriot] sides," the Greek foreign minister continued: "I fully agree with Prime Minister Rallis' statement that a just and honorable settlement of the Cyprus dispute would immediately have a very positive effect on Greco-Turkish relations. The fact is that the Cyprus dispute, which Greece regards as very important, has been the most serious and the most painful of all the problems existing between Turkey and Greece for many years. It is because of this that a just and honorable settlement of the Cyprus dispute will lead to the creation of a new and happy epoch between the two countries. I do believe that such an agreement can be reached and I think that the Turkish Government shares this optimism."

When asked: "Does the arming of the Aegean Islands which, according to the Lausanne Treaty and the 1947 Paris Agreement, should remain disarmed, tally with the political and military alliance of Turkey and Greece within NATO, and, in the light of Prime Minister Rallis' statement that he doesn't believe in the necessity of a nonaggression pact with Turkey any more, do you still regard an attack by Turkey on the Aegean Islands as possible and probable?" Mitsotakis replied as follows:

"I do not want to discuss the legality of defensive measures taken on the Greek islands. As you know, we have different views on the matter. However, I categorically believe that Greece's moves have a legal basis. Apart from this no country can be deprived of the right to defend its own land."

When we asked: "Don't you think that the continental shelf issue in the Aegean is both a political and psychological issue?" Mitsotakis said: "It's both technical and psychological. The psychological aspect, however, carries more weight, and this is why we prefer to resolve it through an international arbitrator on the basis of international law."

When asked: "If Turkey resumes seismic operations in the Aegean, would this cause a problem for you?" The Greek foreign minister said: "The situation is clear. There are disputed and nondisputed waters in the Aegean. An attempt of this kind in disputed waters at such a time may dispel the existing favorable atmosphere. As a matter of fact, both countries have been adhering to a certain agreement on the matter for a few years now, and this state of affairs continues."

Mitsotakis' response to questions related to anti-Turkey associations and publications in Greece was as follows: "The Greek Government's policy envisages the maintenance of good neighbourly relations with Turkey. Therefore, my government will not condone any anti-Turkey move within Greece that is contrary to international law and morality. At the high-level meetings held between the two sides recently, the Turkish side has welcomed the sensitivity displayed by Greece on the matter."

LEADERS GIVE NEW YEAR MESSAGES, FORECASTS FOR 1981

Schmidt Address

LD301740 Hamburg DPA in German 1119 GMT 30 Dec 80

[Excerpts] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA)--Federal Chancellor Helmut Schmidt expects next year to be a "difficult stretch." In his radio and television New Year address he warned, however, against pessimism. But people in the Federal Republic had to realize that 1981 would not be a year "in which great material expectations can be fulfilled." Throughout Europe there would be hardly any economic growth, but in spite of everything, the chancellor stressed, there were "grounds for confidence."

The chancellor noted that over the past 12 months, without overrating itself, the Federal Republic had expended much effort on an active, balanced policy and international cooperation. France and Germany had jointly contributed to ensuring that tension between the two world powers had not been further aggravated. Meanwhile, it had become the generally accepted view that detente would not withstand a second blow such as the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

The chancellor said that one should not change the fact that Germany was divided: "It is something that we still have to bear, but we do not simply accept it and we show in a million ways that we Germans belong together." Peace could not be guaranteed, "but we can and will make our contribution to the preservation of peace."

Genscher Statement

[Text] Bonn, 30 Dec (DPA)--At year's end, FDP Chairman and Federal Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher has warned against political pessimism, resignation and faint-heartedness. In a statement published in Bonn today, he did, however, concede that problems in international cooperation, which thus also affected the permanent securing of peace and international and domestic economic difficulties, gave cause for concern.

With regard to foreign policy, Genscher endorsed a "policy of responsibility," which the Germans were pursuing with their contributions to the viability of the European Community and to the defense capability of the Western alliance. In domestic policy he called for a responsible wage policy and fresh efforts to solve problems in the education sector. Genscher spoke strongly in favor of cooperation with the opposition, where a given situation allowed this.

Genscher said that the characteristics of German foreign policy in 1981 will continue to be "integration in the European Community and NATO, German-American friendship, defense capability and the will to defend, firmness, predictability and the will to cooperate with the Eastern neighbors." These elements also formed the basis for the policy regarding the GDR. The motto of "cooperation against delimitation" must also be the watchword for the coming year. "The GDR must realize that a policy of reducing contacts can delay developments, but not bring them to a halt."

Genscher warned the Soviet Union to accept "Afghanistan and the worldwide reaction to it" as a turning point. The policy of supremacy had no future. The Soviet leadership must recognize the strength of the West's will for cooperation and disarmament and also the advantages which this policy offered them, too. In the interests of peace and its own freedom, the West would not accept superiority on the part of the East.

Stobbe Message

[Text] Berlin, 30 Dec (DPA)--In his New Year message to the population, Berlin's Governing Mayor Dietrich Stobbe stressed the goodwill of the West and its readiness to cooperate with the Eastern bloc states.

In his address on Radio in the American Sector of Berlin and Radio Free Berlin, he said that the German policy of detente needed dialogue between the United States and the Soviet Union on as wide a range of political questions as possible. The long list of issues between the Federal Republic and the GDR must be discussed in the interests of the people in the divided nation. Berlin's security, which in the first line is guaranteed through the presence of the three Western protecting powers and through the Quadripartite Agreement, must be increased through new inter-German agreements.

Stobbe emphasized that the development of Near and Middle East crises had negative effects for Berlin on the decisive East-West relationship. The unresolved questions of arms limitation between the great powers had endangered the equilibrium of strength, the most urgent prerequisite for a rational policy of understanding and a balancing of interests. The transformation in Poland had increased state control in East Europe and, on a world-political scale, brought fresh insecurity to the East-West relationship. GDR measures had worsened this relationship.

PAPERS DISCUSS U.S.-IRANIAN DISPUTE OVER HOSTAGES

[Commentary signed VCK.: "Break With Barbarians"]

[Text] Future American President Reagan will pursue politics in a more dignified style that President Carter--that can be gathered from his preparations for the government reshuffle. Reagan wants to maintain more distance and not put his prestige at stake for specific issues as Carter did too often in foreign policy matters. Word got around in these past years, particularly in the East, that Carter could be blackmailed because he had to score successes for his domestic policy through foreign policy coups de main. That was a burden on the American Middle Eastern policy even during the Egyptian-Israeli peace talks. Even more embarrassing was the linkage between foreign policy and the hoped for domestic political success in the negotiations on the American diplomats held in Tehran. Not only the Americans but also the people of the East are impressed by Reagan's decisive word that America will not pay ransom for the release of the diplomats held by the "barbarians." Reagan knows that we cannot free the prisoners held by the cruel and decrepit Ayatollah Khomeyni with diplomatic tricks, but that he can do so only if America regains its lost prestige in Iran. America needs to act like a world power again, in the interest of the hostages, as well.

30 Dec Press Review

[Press review on the latest status of the U.S.-Iranian hostage conflict]

[Text] The daily DIE WELT writes: Just 3 weeks before the expiration of his term President Jimmy Carter has put into words the absolute limits of his readiness to compromise with the Iranian blackmailers. They apply to the legally justifiable 6.5 billion which the United States plans to release from the confiscated Iranian deposits.

Secretary of State Muskie is speaking of a race against the deadline of 20 January. The signals are clear. If the Iranian fanatics fail to cross the bridge of this ultimate U.S. offer there will no longer be any efforts toward building bridges under the future master of the White House which would be even remotely as generous as they are now.

Freiburg's BADISCHE ZEITUNG makes the following comments: Since it has become known what far-reaching concessions Carter was and still is prepared to make, circumspect politicians in Iran are bound to wonder why the achievement of an accord, which had been so very near, is being further procrastinated by boundless financial demands even though hardly any news concessions can be expected from the new man in the White House. Ronald Reagan with bellicose outbursts in the past few days has done everything to enhance the impression that what is at stake is one last chance.

The Koblenz RHEIN-ZEITUNG stresses this point: This is what the Western world has been waiting for. A U.S. president is talking turkey at long last. Ronald Reagan told the world: No ransom for the hostages. The American popular voice is stirring; Reagan surely will show them. But how? Khomeyni's dictatorship has violated the minimum consensus of foreign policy, international law. If foreign policy in the future seeks to attain its objectives by means of blackmail, politics will turn into terror Reagan is reacting to growing popular ire in the United States. For the sake of the outside world the Californian is setting marks for a strong presidency. But hopefully Reagan knows that answers to questions of expectations are now overdue.

FRANKFURTER RUNDSCHAU writes: Thoughtful foreign observers have an inkling that the taking of the hostages and the concomitant exposure of U.S. impotence and U.S. humilation are but the few factors of integration left in a country in which the individual groups may well attack each other at any time without any great threat from outside, that is to say, a country in which civil war is latent. This, alas, is no consolation for the hostages. The situation has not become any easier since additional demands for billions have been raised, for though it is customary it nevertheless is indecent to compensate for morale with money. The next U.S. president already has denounced the Iranians as barbarians who must not be paid any ransom. Maybe Reagan really means what he says; maybe, and this would be better, he just wants to give his departing predecessor some backing in the latter's attempt to find a solution after all, with the help of the Algerians.

GOVERNMENT DISPUTES DENKTAS ON MISSING PERSONS

NC301803 Nicosia Domestic Service in Greek 1730 GMT 30 Dec 80

[Text] Commenting on recent statement by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktas on the question of missing persons, the government spokesman stressed that Mr Denktas has no right to distort the truth or play with the grief of the thousands of relatives of missing persons from both sides. The spokesman added that in its desire for an early solution of this purely humanitarian issue, the Cyprus Government has already appointed its representative to the investigatory committee in accordance with the pertinent UN resolution and the 19 May 1979 agreement concluded in the presence of the UN secretary general. Finally, the government spokesman stressed that if Mr Denktas is really concerned about ending this human tragedy, he only has to appoint his own representative and cooperate constructively in the operation of the investigatory committee.

Further Denktas Statement

[Text] President Rauf Denktas has said that if there is such a problem as the missing persons issue in Cyprus, then the Greek Cypriots, who from 1963 to 1974 considered it their national cause to massacre babies, children, women and the elderly and buried them in mass graves, are responsible for this problem. Denktas said that the Greek Cypriot administration is distorting the realities of the missing persons issue and that it is lying to its people.

Recalling that there was a unanimous UN decision on the issue, Denktas added that this decision made in 1977 envisaged the establishment of a three-man committee composed of representatives from both communities and from the International Red Cross. Denktas noted that contacts were held in connection with the 1977 decision--to which the Turkish Cypriot side agreed--and that an agreement was also reached on the issue. Denktas added that the Greek Cypriot leadership, who realized that the issue had become soluble, demanded that the committee decisions be by majority vote. Denktas noted that the issue was referred to the International Red Cross and that the Red Cross reply was that on such issues voting was not part of the procedure. Noting that the committee should have been set up and that it should have begun its activities following the Red Cross view on the issue, Denktas added that the Greek Cypriot leadership did not agree because its aim was propaganda.

Denktas recalled that the Greek Cypriot side waited for a year and in 1978 applied to the UN Third Committee, claiming that the Turkish Cypriot side was dodging the establishment of a joint committee and that it was trying to change the 1977 decision in its favor. Denktas noted that subsequently a new resolution was adopted with the participation of a few members and that the Turkish Cypriot side let it be known that it was in favor of and ready for the implementation of the 1977 decision.

Denktas said that during his meeting with Kiprianou in 1979, Waldheim made an (?interim) proposal that was later submitted to the Government of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. The Turkish Cypriot side again expressed its consent to a committee to include representatives from the International Red Cross. He added: This committee has yet to be established because the Greek Cypriot side insists that committee decisions be made by a majority of votes. Denktas said that the International Red Cross cannot be held responsible. He added that, on behalf of Waldheim, a representative is continuing contacts with the Turkish and Greek Cypriot sides and said: The statement made by the Greek Cypriot side today is nothing but a distortion of fact. They are continuing their propaganda with the aim of deceiving their own people.

GREEK CYPRIOTS TO PROTEST TURKISH MEDIA PROGRAMS

[Text] According to reports reaching I SIMERINI, Y. Ioannidhis, the Greek side's interlocutor, will be asked to raise the question of some Turkish Cypriot radio and television programs with strong anti-Hellenic character when the talks are resumed. Specifically, Ioannidhis' attention has been drawn to the contents of a television program carried by Turkish Cypriot television on 26 December. This program made it apparent that the Turkish side is systematically cultivating hatred for Greeks among Turkish Cypriot youths as well as the idea that coexistence with the "Gavur" [infidel] is impossible.

This program, which ran for about an hour, was carried at 1800 on Friday on the anniversary of the outbreak of intercommunal clashes. According to other reports, both the Turkish, Cypriot television and the Turkish Cypriot Radio Bayrak have recently carried programs that were grossly directed against Greek Cypriots and that cultivated hatred for the Greek Cypriot community.

Commenting on all this, competent circles stated to I SIMERINI that the Turkish Cypriot programs conflicted with efforts being exerted create a favorable climate for the talks and promote practical measures for the rapprochement of both communities.

TWO TURKISH CYPRIOT POLITICAL PARTIES MERGE

TA261016 (Clandestine) Bayrak Radio in Turkish to Cyprus 0900 GMT 26 Dec 80

[Text] The Democratic People's Party and the Populist Party have merged under the name of the Democratic People's Party. Speaking in a news conference held at the federated assembly, Democratic People's Party leader Nejat Konuk said that the great similarities in the statutes and programs of the two parties had led to this merger and added that such a development should be considered natural. Konuk said that in accordance with a petition submitted to the Interior Ministry, the members of his party would be active under the newly formed political party.

A statement was released to the press on this occasion signed by Konuk and Suleyman Dolmace, the leaders of the two parties which have merged, and by the general secretaries Ismet Kotak and Oner Adal as well as Democratic People's Deputy General Secretary Erol Andac and People's Party deputy Alper Orhon. The statement was read at the news conference by Populist Party leader Dolmaci. It sums up the guidelines of the new party's program as follows: to fulfill the necessities of our national security which we share with the Turkish nation; to intensify the organization of national institutions including the efforts by our kinsmen dispersed abroad in a bid to provide respect for the Turkish federated state both at home and abroad; to pay the price deserved to those engaged in production as well as the toilers; to deal as a whole with the urban and rural problems to provide collective benefits and keep people from getting rich; to make investments directed toward immediate and productive goals in order to prevent unemployment; to adopt new approaches that will promote the technical level of the federated state and to ensure economic, social and cultural development.

The joint statement concludes: We, who have decided to continue our political struggle under our new title of the democratic People's Party, are appealing to all those who have similar views favoring social-democratic rule, to join our ranks before the elections. We are inviting all those whose beliefs are along these lines to weigh their political views once more and consider our appeal.

KARAMANLIS PREDICTS PROBLEMS FROM EEC ENTRY

NC301730 Paris AFP in English 1721 GMT 30 Dec 80

[Text] Brussels, 30 Dec (AFP)--The January 1 entry of Greece into the European Economic Community will pose certain problems for the country's own economy, Greek President Konstandinos Karamanlis acknowledged today in an interview with the Belgian newspaper LE SOIR:

"We know that intense and unusual effort will be needed in certain sectors of the economy if they are to be able to stand up to the conditions of strong competition of the Common Market," Mr Karamanlis said.

Describing the "administrative machinery" of Greece as weakened due to the country's stormy history over the past 40 years, he said that economic development in Greece "has not yet attained the level of development of the more advanced European countries." However, he added, "It would be utopian to think that little countries, like Greece, could arrive at economic and social progress and economic autarchy through isolationism and stiff tariffs or other protective measures."

"My personal experience and the lessons of history have convinced me of two things," Mr Karamanlis added, "first, that the future of Europe lies in its unification, and second, that the future of Greece lies in a unified Europe."

Greece will be the tenth member of the European Community when it becomes a member on Thursday.

RALLIS HOLDS PRESS CONFERENCE ON EC ACCESSION

Introductory Statement

AT291421 Athens Armed Forces Radio in Greek 1200 GMT 29 Dec 80

[Text of Prime Minister Rallis statement to Greek and foreign journalists on 29 December at the old parliament building in Athens--recorded]

[Text] As you know, in 2 days the country will become a full member of the EC. Consequently it is natural that during this meeting today you will be primarily interested in learning how we, as the government and as the Greek political leadership, view this happy termination of our country's march toward Europe. As you know, this march began 20 years ago under the leadership of the current president of the republic.

I shall reply willingly to your questions, but first I would like to put forth some of my general thoughts that perhaps will make it easier for you to understand points of our policy which may possibly need some explanation. It is also possible that among these general thoughts you will find the answers to some of the questions you intend to ask me.

You already know that the initiative for our country's accession to the EC was a Greek one. We were not forced nor were we asked to accede to the EC. We wanted it and persistently sought full membership following a rather long period of simple association. During the period of association we had the opportunity to closely follow how the EC functions and what benefits--political and economic--are gained by countries which are full members. During this period we also had the opportunity to ascertain the weaknesses of our economy, first, to remedy them as much as possible and, second, to note the points that we should watch specifically during negotiations for our accession in case our application was accepted in principle.

I particularly stress that the initiative for our full membership to the EC was a Greek one because some people in our country see our accession to the EC as the intention of our partners--especially the great European countries--to exploit us.

Greeks who think this way are few and we believe that they are constantly becoming fewer. In addition, the total size of the Greek economy is insignificant when compared with the size of the great European partners of the EC. Consequently, from this viewpoint too, the theory that the great European partners wish to exploit us is entirely unfounded.

The reasons why we sought accession were economic and political. The economic reasons are assessable. We weighed the advantages and the disadvantages of accession and we determined that the economic benefits we would obtain were overriding.

However, there are also political reasons that weighed on our decision to seek accession to the EC. With this accession the isolation of the Greek nation, which has lasted for thousands of years, has ended. Despite its great usefulness we do not view the EC as a final goal but as a significant preparatory stage for the implementation of European unity. Our country believes in European unity and in the huge political role a united Europe can play in the current world. I can add that with our participation we shall strengthen our democratic institutions and--as members of a large and strong community--we shall definitely protect our independence.

Our course toward Europe was also dictated by cultural reasons. It is a common European admission that the European civilization has its roots in Greece. Personally I believe that this common European conscience played a dominant role during the negotiations on our accession to the EC. Many obstacles existed and several objections were made but at the last moment a positive view toward our admission to Europe always prevailed. At this historical hour it would be a mistake not to pay tribute to the common European conscience which sees our country as the mother of European civilization.

As of 1 January we shall be a full, equal member of the EC and the question arises: How shall we use the power given to us by our equal participation in the EC? It is not possible to reply in detail to this question. However, our European partners can be absolutely sure about one thing. Greece will always maintain a positive stance toward any proposal that aims at strengthening and unifying Europe. Our course will always be determined by the basic goal of our policy: Europe and unification. I thank you and am ready to reply to your questions.

Question Period

AT301530 Athens I KATHIMERINI in Greek 30 Dec 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] The press conference given by the prime minister to representatives of the Greek and foreign press was attended by D. Papaspirou, chairman of the Chamber of Deputies; L. Bournias, first deputy chairman of the Chamber; G. Kondoyioryis, minister on EEC affairs who replied to special questions; A. Tsaldharis, deputy minister to the prime minister and N. Dhelipetros, press and information secretary general. The text of the conference was as follows:

Question: Given that the rate of inflation acceptable to the EEC is 15 percent and that inflation in Greece this year stands at 25 percent, how do you think Greece will be able to decrease its inflation without having other great domestic problems?

Answer: This percentage is no obstacle to our accession to the Community. Naturally member states must take care to remain close to the average rate of inflation and our effort will be toward limiting our inflation as much as possible for this year below the rate of 25 percent.

Question: To what degree is Greece ready to benefit from all the benefits it expects from its accession to the EEC?

Answer: We believe that the necessary preparation has been undertaken. This is the preparation which will permit us to enjoy the fruits which will be provided to us nearly to the full.

I do not believe that the pessimists, who speak about our inability to absorb the credits to be made available to us, are right. It will be proven that exactly the contrary will happen. We will be in a position to absorb the credits to the last limit.

Question: How would you answer the observation which has very often been made, that the reasons for acceptance of Greek accession were primarily sentimental and political and far less financial, and that Greece will, perhaps, suffer or that it will pay for the lack of sufficient economic preparation?

Answer: No economic sector is being affected by our accession to the Community. Next year industry will have decreased dues which will be protective by comparison to 1980 but this is nothing new. This was provided for under our entry which has a preliminary history of 20 years. In agriculture, as well, our accession will have no adverse effect. By contrast there will be an advantage in that Greek agricultural products imported to Common Market countries will not have to pay the dues which they had to pay to date. The freedom in the exchange of labor will not work against Greece. It would be peculiar to imagine that German workers will come to settle here in order to compete with ours. By comparison with what has happened in other countries, I do not think the scientists will meet with competition and that they will be placed in a position worse than that of their foreign colleagues. Consequently nothing new will take place.

Question: You once again referred to the notorious "isolation." The opposition, however, argues that very often--as for example during the tragedy of Cyprus--whatever happened did happen because specifically there was no isolation, because Greece was a member of the Atlantic alliance. In what way, therefore, do you see that the EEC will strengthen the democratic institutions of our country?

Answer: Simply because the Common Market does not accept as members countries which do not have a democratic regime. This prerequisite of the Common Market would make an aspiring dictator, in any given country, think ten times before he presents himself as the savior of a nation. Because I can foresee a sequel to this question referring to Turkey, I will state that Turkey is not a member of the Common Market. It simply has a connection. What I have stated applies to member states which must have a democratic regime. An attachment or an agreement can be concluded even with countries which do not have a democratic regime.

Question: Fears have been expressed that accession will affect interests which are professional, of the social welfare institutions and so forth. What effect could accession have upon acquired rights? With another question, what effect will there be on the equality of the drachma which will have to be established as of 1 January?

Answer: I do not believe that influences in the sectors of economy will have adverse results to the degree that we will have to revise our original decision, which was primarily based upon sectors which are of primary interest to our country, such as the agrarian sector which will greatly benefit from accession. If there are effects on certain other professions, which do not have as much importance as the agrarian sector, these will be imperceptible. In reference to the currency effects, Mr Kondoyioryis will answer that question. In reference to social insurance there is no joint policy in the EEC. Each country has its own social insurance. Gradually there could be a joint policy in the social insurance sector within the Community but at this moment it does not exist. Consequently there will be no change in what applies in our country today. In reference to the equality of the drachma, as of 11 December and on the basis of the accession agreement, the drachma was introduced into the Paris stock exchange and before that an interbank foreign exchange mart opened in Athens. Establishment of the free negotiation of the drachma was essential in order to establish, shortly prior to accession, what its real, representative value was in relation to other currencies so that its price could be established in relation to the European unit.

This establishes the par at which it will be converted from the date of our accession, thus establishing the conversion price for agricultural products, fixed in European units, into drachma.

Question: How do you handle the results of an official opinion poll by an EEC committee that only 40 out of 100 Greeks are clearly in favor of accession, and 33 of the followers of the left look positively upon accession--in other words, their views do not conform to the line of the leftwing parties?

Answer: I attribute no special significance to the various "polls" because in Greece the citizen has not yet got used to answer sincerely to the questions submitted to him. This will also come in time. Consequently, irrespective of the fact that polls also have a margin of error which could be significant, what one could establish, even on the basis of facts which are not totally sufficient, is that there is a lack of satisfactory information among public opinion. It is for this reason that we resolved to undertake an information drive.

Question: An imperative element for the completion of accession is the election of Greek representatives to the European Parliament. When and under what system will such elections be conducted?

Answer: It is my personal opinion that the election of representatives for the European Parliament must be held the same day as national elections. This is so that one election will not influence the other. This is my personal opinion. The party has not reached any decisions. As you know, I cannot speak in advance of the party's opinion. I believe there ought to be one ballot for the entire state without any crosses of preference. I will in time make recommendations to the party. The majority of the party will then decide. A bill will be drafted and it will be presented to the Chamber of Deputies which will then decide by its own majority vote.

Question: At this moment there is a fragmentation within a multitude of small-and medium-sized businesses. What will be the repercussions from accession upon this great number of small and medium businesses?

Answer: At the outset there will be a unification of the smaller businesses into stronger units. This was also the goal of the various businesses and this view was also expressed in very many bills during the past 30 years. Over and above this, however, the small businesses could offer a great deal to the Greek economy because they have a great advantage in quality. Large-scale businesses do not have any special personal character for the consumer. The small businesses, however, can approach the personal character of each consumer. This ability suits the smaller Greek businesses and I believe that it is for this reason that they will manage to market their products in the Common Market.

Question: Recently a portion of the Greek press as well as officials of the EEC questioned the credibility of certain facts presented by the Greek Government. What does the government intend to do in order to restore this credibility?

Answer: (Kondoyioryis) Throughout the negotiations, for 3 and 1/2 years, there was never any questioning of the statistical facts with which we supplied the Community. I personally had followed strict instructions for an exhaustive check so that all the facts we would be supplying would be fully and absolutely objective. It would be ridiculous for us to attempt to deceive the Community with false facts. It could soon be proved that they were not true.

Question: Is the government prepared to place the mass information media at the disposal of the opposition so that public opinion may be informed by it on accession to the EEC thus ending monologue and instituting dialogue in this direction?

Answer: There is no reason for this. Briefing is on technical matters, information on obligations and rights. This is not a question of dialogue or monologue. If the opposition wants to conduct politics and to accuse the government it can do so through its own press.

Question: It is believed that full Greek accession to the EEC will also strengthen efforts to solve unresolved issues between Greece and Turkey through the members of the EEC because after a time and of necessity Greece, as a member of the Community, will be taking part in economic assistance to Turkey, which is supplied by EEC member states.

Answer: The Community will not deal with Greek-Turkish differences. These are bipartite issues and will be discussed, as they are being discussed, between the two countries. The Community will not be involved in these differences. As to Turkish affairs vis-a-vis third countries, Greece will take its position bearing in mind the interests of Europe but also its own interests.

Question: What will be the amount of credits offered to Greece from various Community sources? When will these be made available in fact? What will be the amount of Greek contribution to the Community fund?

Answer: (Kondoyioryis) I will reply in reference to 1981. We will receive 13 percent of the total amount from the regional fund. This amounts to 195 million European Currency Units [ECU], but for technical reasons we will be unable to utilize the total of this amount. On the basis of facts and projects we estimate that we will be able to absorb 125 million ECU. The first payments will start in April. We hope to be able to absorb 10 to 12 million ECU from the Community fund as compared to 15 million estimated during the negotiations. There will be a distribution by country from the agricultural fund but this is a question of programs to be submitted. Under [regulation] 392/72 which deals with the execution of basic projects, the process provides that we will execute the projects, that we supply the funds and then at the end of the year we submit our accounts for payment. In other words, payment could be made after 1 January next year. In other words, we will receive from the various funds a total of: 125 plus 10-12 million ECU plus a sum which has not yet been established but which could be 12 million ECU. In the budget we have incorporated 137 million. I will now refer to the amounts to be received as guaranteed subsidies on agricultural products and support of farmers' income. We had estimated this amount at 216 million ECU. Current estimates, however, raise this amount to 250 million. The amount we will receive from this source is higher for several reasons: One, because income subsidy to producers is 7 drachma per kilo for olive oil as agreed upon for payment as of 1 January. It will, however, be paid for November's production. Two, because estimates were based on an average production of 210,000 tons of olive oil while this year's production is much higher. Another reason that the sum we estimated will be increased is the greater production of wheat. While we estimated 250 million ECU, we have now reached 416 million. We must state here that due to an increase of corn production we will import only 300,000 tons instead of the estimated 900,000 tons. Consequently, we will be saving the equivalent subsidy on the basis of 600,000 tons of corn which at 4.5 drachma per kilo gives two million drachma or approximately 40 million ECU. The total of our transfers amounts to 275 million ECU. Thus, while during negotiations we estimated a benefit of 80 million, now under the most conservative estimates this can amount to 140 million and could go as high as 200 million ECU.

HEAD OF STATE EVREN ISSUES NEW YEAR'S MESSAGE

[New Year Day message by Gen Kenan Evren, head of state, chief of staff and National Security Council president,--read by announcer]

[Summary] Dear citizens, today we are entering with new hopes the year 1981, leaving behind a year that had more bitter days than happy ones. May it be a happy new year. At a time when the world population is rapidly increasing and available resources are becoming more scarce, the human race is trying to struggle with economic crises that threaten its future. I am convinced that through additional resources to be provided by science and technology these crises will be overcome. I would like to point out, nevertheless, that adventurous plans, war and terrorism should be shunned in favor of cooperation for the prosperity of all mankind.

"Under the guidance of the Ataturk principles and in accordance with the genuine desire of our nation and through its support, positive steps have been taken in our country in this direction. Anarchy and terrorism--nurtured by local and foreign treacherous centers--have been wiped out, and active measures have been taken in a bid to restore state authority as well as justice and to stabilize the economic balance."

The Turkish nation, which has always coped with numerous crises in the past through its unity and solidarity--with the help of the Turkish Armed Forces, which are proud to be in its service, and of the Ataturkist and enlightened youth--will again overcome all difficulties with the encouragement that the year of the Ataturk centennary is to provide. "The conditions of the past bitter years, which paralyzed the democratic system and which destroyed all possibilities of economic development, have been completely eradicated. The new year will be a year of efforts exerted to compensate for damage and losses incurred in past years as well as to accelerate our economic development in a bid to make up for the time lost."

All civil servants must work efficiently and citizens must assume their responsibilities and must obey and help security forces so that the state machine can run smoothly and fully. Prosperity and development can only be achieved through the unification of all forces for the same goal. Let us always recall that in order to live in unity and freedom within the borders drawn by Ataturk and to be able to protect our place within contemporary civilization, we must work incessantly in all fields in a planned and effective manner.

"Those who aimed at dividing Turkey or destroying it by fragmenting it or even at using it as a ready market have incited the disputes between the right and the left and between progressives and reactionaries and have thus tried to obstruct our unity." Our people will remain vigilant and united against the revival of such sly and ugly acts. Every step made toward economic development will intimidate and disrupt them. The Ataturk teachings and principles will be our guide in this struggle.

Economic problems--whose sources are in the outside world--which have affected our country have been aggravated by inefficient development planning and irresponsible policies of consumption. "In order to restore economic balance, it is imperative to step up production through effective and speedy measures and to control and even limit consumption as much as possible to prevent wasteful spending." All savingmeasures, particularly in the energy field, should not be expected from the state. I am convinced that the Turkish nation, known worldwide for its patriotism, will do its best to this end and that our goal will be reached as soon as possible along the road traced by the lofty Ataturk. If we act with this understanding, 1981 will be a prosperous and successful year in which solutions to all our problems will be found. I hope that the coming year will be a year of peace and security for our country and the world at large and will bring health and happiness to our people and mankind.

[Excerpt] Funerals are being held in Ankara today for the Turkish consul general in Sydney, Sarik Ariyak, and his bodyguard Engin Sever murdered in Australia on 17 December. Deputy General secretary of the head of state Brigadier Gen Hasan Saglam, National Security Council member and Navy Commander Adm Nejat Tumer, Prime Minister Bulent Ulusu, certain ministers, senior army commanders as well as members of the diplomatic corps and relatives and friends of Ariyak and Sever were present at the ceremonies held at the Foreign Ministry at 1100.

Speaking at the ceremony, Foreign Minister Ilter Turkmen recalled that during the last 7 years, 15 members of the Foreign Ministry had been the victim of despicable attacks abroad directed against the Turkish state. Expressing his conviction that sooner or later the perpetrators of these crimes and their conspirators would receive the punishment they deserve, Turkmen said: Let no one misunderstand the calm stand of the noble Turkish people that deplore hatred and enmity. The fact that none of the culprits that attacked our diplomats in various parts of the world have ever been discovered is provoking a justified concern and indignation among our people. We shall insist more than ever on the capture of those responsible. We are appealing to all countries in which we have our diplomatic representations for more protection for our diplomats and other employees.

The security forces seized 160,000 arms from the terrorists, an arsenal sufficient to equip 16 divisions, according to official announcements. During the same period, lost 27 members. [sentence as received]

The Istanbul Martial Law Tribunal released yesterday 10 persons including well-known cargo line operators Ziya and Sefer Savas Kalkavan heeding an objection tabled by their lawyers against their being under arrest. The 10, dubbed by the Turkish press as "godfathers" had been arrested because of arms smuggling and illegal foreign currency dealings.
